"We accepted the money with great pride," said one University official. "And I was fortunate enough to pick out just how to spend it: We're going to paint every single campus parking lot the color of its name. Blacktop lots are so boring. We need a little decorative color on this campus, and now we'll have yellow and purple and green and red pavements to drive on. It'll be grand. It's the best possible way to ensure the quality of this University continues to bloom in order to make UMass a home for all to enjoy."

Officials said a crew of one man would cover each lot with 27 coats of the most expensive paint in the country.

"We want to make sure we did the job right," said the UMass official. "If we had to spend a couple million more than the job needed, so be it. At least those parking lots will look spiffy in the end."

The project will take place over the next six years. During the construction period, all parking lots will be closed. University officials apologize for this inconvenience, but don't care very much.

SYLVAN RESIDENTIAL AREA

Dorm to move further from OHill

"We're moving on out!" proclaimed the Sylvan Area Government governor yesterday after a heated debate among Resident Assistant union leaders and Housing Services officials. "They crumbled, and we're heading further to the East Side!"

The plan was hatched with the small, yet obvious idea: Sylvan residents detest people and can't stand being so close to the center of campus. SAG officials first discussed it among their RA staff. And then, the verdict: All of Sylvan — from tall towers to stone walls to every last fallen pine needle — would be moved deeper into North Amherst and away from campus.

"We like our privacy," said one Sylvan resident. "And ever since Orchard Hill got that new parking lot, more cars have been driving past our buildings. It's annoying! We Sylvaners have to share dining halls with other people. We have to walk on the same sidewalks as other people. We have to go to classes with other people. We have to breath the same air as other people ... so if we're giving up all that, I don't see what the problem is in wanting to have some alone time in our dorm."

Construction will begin this summer. Under the agreement, Sylvan will be relocated 20 miles east of its current position. Ten-foot-high fences will enclose the residential area. Only "true Sylvaners" will be permitted on site. At the sole security checkpoint, RA on duty will monitor traffic through retina scans and urine tests.

Currently, union leaders are arguing for the benefits, including afternoon crumpets and tea, for those RA who will be scheduled for duty.

FINE ARTS CENTER

Lombardi calls for more construction

"Again!" enthuses Lombardi.

Chancellor John V. Lombardi announced yesterday that construction on the Fine Arts Center would begin from scratch, once again, at the end of this month. This will extend the project another four years and cost the University of Massachusetts $73 million extra dollars.

"I saw how things had progressed, and I just wasn't happy with the entrance," Lombardi said. "I've been realizing how much I miss Florida, so I figure we can just recreate the FAC to remind us of south, sunny beaches."

By the time the project is completed, 88 palm trees will line Haggis Mall. Diamond studs will embed the walkway. One hundred thousand gallons of white sand will cover the cement ground, and a 19-foot-high statue of Mickey Mouse will be erected in place of that ugly, weird red metal thing.

"To some," said Lombardi, "it may see like an unnecessary expense, but look at it this way: It'll make me less homesick."

ing and destructive behavior that has disgraced the University's proud name."

Romney, who has never publicly visited the UMass' Amherst campus, but who as governor holds a seat on Harvard University's Board of Trustees, said he believes Kriss is accurate in his generalization of unionized workers being useless slobs.

"I have lived my entire life in wealth and comfort," said Romney. "Both my parents made attempts at the U.S. presidency. My father was Governor of Michigan. Even if I haven't lived in Massachusetts for long, I know how to fix the University of Massachusetts."

A summary of additional repercussions for students involved in "misconduct" is also included in Romney's Proposal. These repercussions included mandatory weekly blood bank donations, and the repossession of these students' vehicles and possessions.

"At the very least, I will make certain anyone who even dares to entertain a thought of congregating in a vile, malicious, juvenile, and perhaps even inhumane manner will know that just as UMass serves, so they will serve UMass; and they will come to know and love this Commonwealth," he writes in his proposal.

The proposal has been sent by Romney's cabinet to The Massachusetts Daily Riotgram as a letter to the editor. According to Lieutenant Governor Kerry Healey, Romney believes this is the best method in which to address the UMass community, since his schedule will not permit him time to visit the campus anytime in the next 128 years.

Blue Wall will be SGA President-elect Eduardo Bustamante.

"I won the SGA election because I wear pimp suits and girls think I'm hot. I'm as smooth as Eddie Murphy, and twice as funny," said Bustamante.

Representing the gay, lesbian, transgendered, and anyone-else-who-wants-to-force-straight-people-to-use-uni-sex-bathrooms will be Jared Nokes, the speaker of the student senate and a newly inducted member of the Pride Alliance. The group will be officially changing their name to "Pride of Lions" in a small ceremony during the party.

"The name 'Pride of Lions' is a much stronger, masculine name," said Nokes. "The name change will help our group promote ourselves as a metrosexual men's club."

Nokes said metrosexual men on the UMass campus are usually stereotyped as whiney, flared-jean, designer bag addicts.

"With a name like 'Pride of Lions', we hope to encourage more metrosexual men to join our group," he said. "I mean, I just, like, adore my Louis Vuitton bag."

Bustamante and Rene Gonzalez of the Office of ALANA both refused to comment when The Massachusetts Daily Riotgram asked if they would consider joining the Pride of Lions. Anonymous sources did say that Gonzalez, the UMass Perpetual Political Science graduate student, will remain female-free unless he stops wearing that hat.

The "Gargano Gala" will begin at 6 p.m. in the Blue Wall. It is free and open to anyone except for Eoin Moore, a recent SGA presidential candidate and confirmed werewolf.

Suck it up, pansies

Gilad Skolnick

About two days ago I returned to my room to find two complete strangers there. One was sitting on my bed talking to my roommate and another was on my computer.

I soon found out that they were Rutherford and Marvin, my two new roommates, in addition to the roommate that I already had, all part of the University of Massachusetts's new program to accept thousands more students than usual in an effort to make more money.

With the housing crunch, what was once double is now a quadruple or as in my friend Agatha's case, a quintuple. I can't say that I like having three roommates. Especially with only two beds it creates an awkward situation every night. It could be worse I guess; spooning with Rutherford isn't half as bad as i thought it would be.

UMass' economic reform plan might seem a bit tough for some but this is no Amherst College and we have to let go of some of the conveniences of life. In fact, UMass has begun replacing all our free call boxes with call boxes that cost a dollar a call. I wasn't too happy when the call box wouldn't take my crumpled up dollar bill as I was being attacked by the two campus swans and desperately trying to call the police, but at least this is preparing me for the real world.

And I guess the scaling back of janitors isn't that bad. Sure from now on janitors will be cleaning the dorm bathrooms only once a semester in the dorms, but we're not animals. It's not like fellow UMassers use the toilets without flushing, or vomit all over the place every weekend. We don't live in some primitive world where people shave their beards over the sinks or dump their food in them, clogging them up. I'm sure as mature students, we're able to clean up after ourselves.

The changes made for the Dining Commons are reasonable, I guess, as well. We do have too many geese in our pond, and The Goose with Duck and Swan Sprinkles that was served at the DC last night was delicious. I understand that the DC wants to save money on getting food, so I can't complain. The vegans might not be too happy but the geese deserve it anyway. They've been giving me mean looks lately.

I don't really mind how they plan to add a few hundred meals to the minimum meal plan and make the plan cost a bit more either. It's not like anyone ever has any meals left over at the end of each semester anyway, and you can never get sick of the DC.

I just feel it's a bit excessive of Gov. Mitt Romney to take direct control of our University and rent our field by the campus pond to the US army for live artillery exercises. Just yesterday they overshot the field and hit the sidewalk in back of me. It's just not fun being hit by shrapnel on the way to my public speaking class.

We need to raise taxes in this state. I am tired of these budget cuts. I was shocked last week when I found two UMass Police Department officers patrolling campus on goats, rented from the ruthless UMass goat herding club. Cheaper than both police cars and horses, although a bit slow, the goats are notorious biters and intimidating to the vast majority of UMass students who in recent study were found to be goatphobic.

We do have too many geese in our pond, and The Goose with Duck and Swan Sprinkles that was served at the DC last night was delicious.

In addition, rent has been increased to all UMass organizations, such as the Daily Collegian, which in turn has been forced to hike the price of its daily paper to $4 an issue. Please bring your payment to the Collegian office. This is an honor system but if you do not pay you are a thief and will be tracked down by the UMPD Goat Patrol.

I guess some things are necessary, like having our professors pay twice as much in parking fees while keeping the same salary, and the new Romney-invented "With a Can of Care" initiative, in which professors spend two hours a day sitting outside the campus center with tin cans to collect coins for gas money. Just last week I saw one of my professors there. I meant to give him a quarter, but I accidentally gave him my last jumbo-sized, banana flavored condom. Oh well, I can always buy more.

There are also a few more positives, such as the Blue Wall deciding to turn itself into a strip club at night to attract more college students. At least it will provide more job opportunities for the hotties on campus.

With the economy at a downturn we all have to make a few sacrifices. These changes are getting phased in, so if you aren't already experiencing some of these don't be surprised if you don't see them in the coming days. All I ask for is that Marvin stop eating my food.

I'm coming out

Janet Jackson's Right Breast

Greetings. This statement is a long time coming, as I feel I have been highly misrepresented in the media. I am Janet Jackson's Right Breast. You may remember me from the Super Bowl halftime special. Janet and I have had a long career together. We have dated many guys together, been in many music videos, and lip-synced at many, many concerts together.

We have been through a lot, but for some reason, Janet has always garnered most of the attention, and most of the acclaim. I have decided to break the silence. It was my idea to have Justin rip off the Samurai costume piece to reveal me in all my nipple-shielded glory. I am 40 years old now, and my image has been faked in many pictures on the Internet. People have been looking at me for years, but never have they been able to look me in the eye. But on that faithful day, the world saw me and I saw you, and boy, you people UGLY.

I had no freaking idea that you people were all so BUSTED! I mean, I heard the pot-shots that Bill O'Reilly made about me on his "TV show," calling me "wrinkled and old" — which is totally false because I have been enhanced at least six times. There is not a spot, a stretch mark or chicken pox scar to be found on me. Have you all seen Bill's face ... without makeup? His face is ROUGH TIMES. He is blotchy, pocked, wrinkled and misshapen. It's no wonder he hates everyone, he looks worse than Eric Stoltz in the movie "The Mask," where the horribly deformed boy tries to get a date.

And can we talk about Justin Timberlake, please? He is possibly the gayest Gaylord I have ever met. He's short and pinched-looking and for some reason he thinks that because he impersonates Janet's brother, that he's black. He's not black. He's from Tennessee and sang a song called "Pop." The boys from Dead Prez are black, Jay-Z is black, even Michael is blacker than Justin, and Michael isn't even black anymore.

I have a lot to say on many issues. I don't understand why something?

Let's face it, you people are jealous. The girls want to be me, and the boys want to grab me. Ladies, you were just afraid that

Tom Brady might not want to date your $oro-stitute asses when he saw my beautifully jeweled face. I don't need you haters trying to bring me down. I am going to continue to be enhanced, strapped, pierced, jiggled, and decorated and nothing you people say will stop me. NOTHING.

Xtina made fun of me at the Grammy Awards, which I was not allowed to attend, and let me tell you, that gutter slut is dead. DEAD. I am going to personally knock the snot and rusted body jewelry out of her stank ass. I hope you're reading this, Xtina, because I mean business. You are done.

It's OK to see Joan Rivers' alien mug on TV all the time, but you all can't handle a little titty?

As for Justin, his time is up too. He never slept with Britney because he's a filthy homosexual. Not that I dislike homosexuals, because they are fabulous and Janet's brother is a big one so I'm not hating, but Justin Timberlake is dead to me. I'm not going to hit him though, because I'd never hit a lady, so I'm going after his mom.

I'm sorry I have gotten so upset as I am writing this, but I have been locked up enough. I got my first breath of fresh air time when Captain Fag malfunctioned at being a heterosexual, and now I'm sticking around.

You better recognize.

PO-PO TO KICK IT AT HOEDOWN

Matt Brochu

The University of Massachusetts Police Department shockingly broke its prolonged silence yesterday at a press conference in front of, well ... no one important, regarding the impending Hobart Hoedown. For those members of the student body who are unaware of this event (i.e. out-of-state freshmen), this tradition takes place each May, as thousands of students begin drinking promptly at 9 a.m., pausing only for the purposes of taking drunken pictures, popping squats and boning in walk-in closets.

When asked about the odd timing of the conference, UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor had the following to say: "Well it's getting to be that time of year. The sun is out, the air is sweeter, and the sorority whores are wearing those short shorts with the words on the ass, so we felt the time was right for an announcement."

Founded in 1974, this infamous collegiate gathering obtains its quite appropriate name from a) its location, as it takes place on or around Hobart Lane, and b) its sex-first, protection-last mentality ... or as Dave Chapelle would say, "The hoes (YEAAYYA!) that go down (WHHAATT!) on each other (OK!) for piss warm Busch Lights ... skeet skeet skeet skeet."

These courageous students (all of which are over the legal drinking age of 21), traditionally consume alcoholic beverages until the sun goes down, at which point they order an obscene amount of Wings, attempt to pay the delivery guy with a $10 bill, eat until they puke, and more importantly, rally to drink more.

This is generally the time when law enforcement, a fun-loving mixture of Amherst Police, Staties, and UMPDildos, decides to intervene. Decked out in riot gear, these men mercilessly patrol the streets, drowning kittens, molesting children, and kicking the change-cups out of homeless men's hands until order is restored. Because they're all pansies, they must wield weapons as well, carrying everything from pepper spray and riot shields to billy clubs and that big laser that destroyed all the buildings in "Independence Day." For these reasons, riots generally ensue.

Eddie Winslow, a UMass senior, had this to say about last year's Hobart Riots: "I was teaching my four-year-old brother to ride a tricycle near Puffton that day, and some officer approaches us. Tells us he needs to see ID. I told him my brother was four and didn't have ID, so the guy flips out and tells me, 'Open your mouth again, and you'll be worse off than Roy was after the tiger was through with him.' Before I knew it, he kicked me in the junk, pepper sprayed my brother in the face, and stole the damn tricycle. All I can remember is waking up and seeing that scrawny mofo peddling away on my brother's trike, in those lame boots. That's something I'll never forget."

But this unprovoked act of violence was not an isolated incident. Two years ago, UMPD busted into what they deemed a suspicious Boltwood meeting, resulting in the arrest of three individuals (all of which were mentally disabled), after the young adults failed to color inside the lines. Last year the chaos continued, as Christopher O. Viggiano was taken into custody at his daytime residence, Busy-Bee Daycare, and eventually arraigned on charges of indecent exposure. "Of course I still pissed at the urinal with my pants around my ankles at that stage of my life," Chris, now 6 years of age, said in a statement made by his attorney. "Every 5-year-old boy does that shit. We know that our asses are hanging out, but at that age are dongs are like fire hoses, they need at least 2 hands to keep it spraying in the right direction."

> "Instead of being assholes, we're just going to take the day off and hang out with the kids, sort of like a community outreach day."
> - UMPD Chief Barbara O'Connor

The dickhead decisions made by law enforcement have almost become a greater tradition than the Hoedown itself. But Chief O'Connor says not this year:

"On Hoedown day, our holding cells get so over-crowded that we have to lodge the overflowing prisoners in surrounding hotels, most notably the Howard Johnson. So we figured out the problem: Drunken students don't start riots. Cops in riot gear start riots. Instead of being assholes, we're just going to take the day off and hang out with the kids, sort of like a community outreach day. So a note to Amherst citizens, don't bother with 911 that day, because we'll probably all be sloshed."

The university administration has become increasingly involved in the situation over the course of this event's escalation. Michael Gargano, vice chancellor of student affairs, has proposed a two-point plan to aid the police force: "Well first of all, we need to change the riot culture by changing the name of Southwest. I was thinking, something cool like Hymen. Kids could be all like, 'So where you living?' and you could reply, 'Oh, ya know, in Hymen. It's pretty chill there.' "

"Secondly, we're going to provide students with a safe alternative to rioting by setting up a carnival at the Hobart entrance, led by my Grandmaster Danny Dickson (the DC Jumper). Assorted games will be played, including a PoPo dunk tank, but with a slight twist. Instead of throwing softballs at a stationary target, the students will be asked to launch bottles directly at the officers' heads." When asked about safety issues, Gargano replied, "Don't worry, we'll give them helmets."

An overzealous reporter at the press conference was a bit more skeptical, asking, "What precautions are being taken to prevent the setting of fires? You are aware that several bushes were burned to the ground last year."

"Haha," Gargano giggled to the crowd. "She said bush. I'm wicked drunk, by the way."

A HEARTFELT APOLOGY TO A GREAT AMERICAN COWBOY

We at The Daily Riot!-gram would like to confess something. It's not something we are proud of, but we feel the need to finally come clean on it.

The Riot!-gram has always given a bum rap to President George W. Bush. We've called him a cheater, a liar, a barbarian who would rather send troops off to die than see two gay guys get married, and a dyslexic hick with an IQ smaller than his Texas-sized cattle prod. We've even made fun of the fact that he looks more like a chimpanzee than any other human being on Earth.

Well, we would like to take this opportunity to say that we are sorry.

The truth is, George W. Bush is a wonderful man, and deserving of another four years as president.

Granted, the USA Patriot Act allows the government to tap your phones, read your e-mail, stare at you in the shower and run over your beloved dog, Sparky. But c'mon, the acronym is so damn clever. Only a man with a Yale education and a spotless, fully disclosed military record could come up with such an acronym. it's so well thought out that even some of Bush's top officials don't know what it stands for.

"I know the letter A stands for 'America,' and I think the T stands for 'Texas,' but other than that i'm clueless," said national security advisor Condoleezza Rice recently.

Someone who can come up with an acronym that clever must be doing something right.

And let's all stop kidding ourselves — we all know Saddam Hussein was directly responsible for the Sept. 11 attacks on the World Trade Center, and needed to be punished for it. Hussein has even admitted that he would have been flying one of the planes himself if his 18th wife, Zakia Hakki Ismail Safia al Souhail, hadn't made him stay home and have tea with the first lady of the al-Qaida terrorist group. For Bush not to go after such a heartless Nazi-Commie-fascist-terrorist-scumbag would have been both uncivilized and un-American.

Sure, Bush didn't find Weopons of Mass Destruction in Iraq (or on Mars for that matter), but you can't blame the guy for trying. And by raising gas prices, he forces more and more Americans to walk to work every morning and shed the excess fat from the double-quarter-pounder and fries they had for dinner the night before. Anyone who fails to see all of the wonderful things Bush has done for this country is clearly un-American.

We hope all of you out there accept our apology. The Riot!-gram vows that it will never say anything bad about Dubya or his policies ever again. He is a great man, and a great American. He may launch an ill-advised war every now and then, but is that a crime?

We fully endorse President Bush's reelection campaign. After all, any man who "knows how hard it is to put food on your family" has got to be an OK guy. And by the way ... don't mess with Texas.

Booty.

For many at the University of Massachusetts, it's a goal, a fountain of youth.

For the thousands who will be in attendance for UMass' annual Spring Concert in May though, it will be the last thing they want to see.

University Productions and Concerts announced the bill for its Spring Concert yesterday, and in an attempt to break tradition of featuring three crappy acts that don't fit together, the organization revealed it has recruited the help of several local musicians for the May 9 show.

With the help of Michael "G-Unit" Gargano, Chancellor John V. Lombardi will take the stage as his alter ego "J-Lo" for a two-hour show.

"I've been getting trashed and singing karaoke for a year in the Blue Wall Pub, so I figured it was about time I make my big debut," J-Lo said. "Jennifer Lopez? I'm the REAL diva here, and I got a bigger ghetto booty, to boot."

An unconfirmed source said the act promises to be raunchier than in years past.

"Lil' Kim would blush if she knew what G-Unit plans on doing to J-Lo," the source said. "He's out to prove he's a thug."

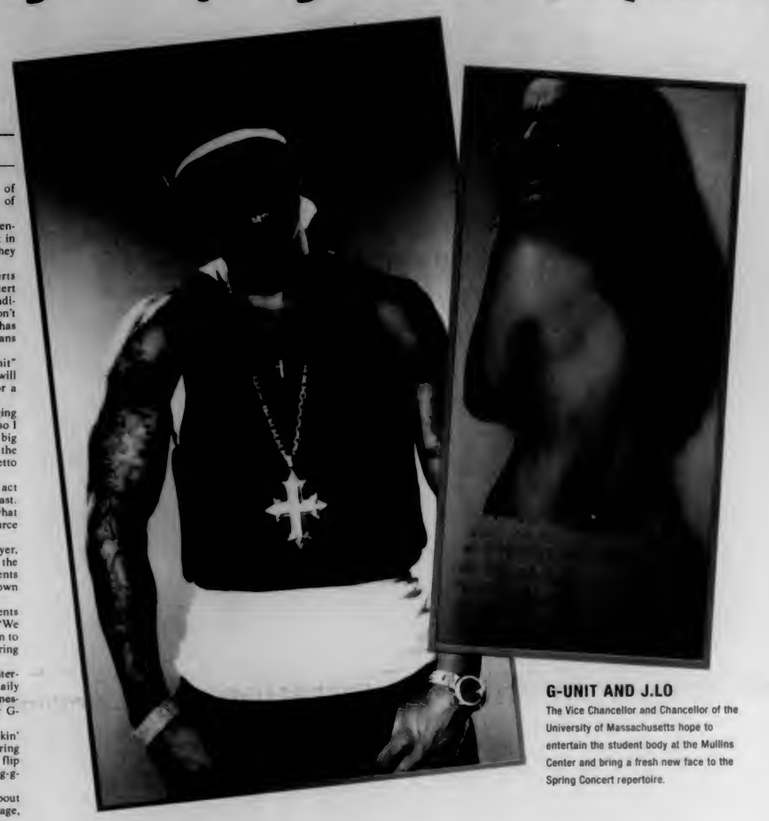
Joseph S. Queezzerdeedermeyer, spokesman for UPC, said the reason for the departure from the type of lineup students are accustomed to seeing really comes down to the University's needs.

"G-Unit said he wants to put 'Students First,' " Queezzerdeedermeyer said. "We can't think of a better way to do that than to let him do what he wants with the Spring Concert."

Gargano refused comment when interviewed by The Massachusetts Daily Collegian yesterday, but responded to a message left on his answering machine for G-Unit.

"Yo I'm gonna show ya what I'm talkin' 'bout," G-Unit said. "Last year's Spring Concert wasn't shit compared to when I flip the scrip' on this one. G-g-g-g-g-g-UUUNit."

J-Lo said he has heard the rumors about G-Unit trying something with him on stage, but says he is not worried about it.



"It's Mike freakin' Gargano, and he's a freakin' midget," J-Lo said. "I don't care how much leather he wears, he still ain't gonna be hot enough to touch this fine ass. He might be thugged out, but there ain't enough ghetto in that man for my ghetto booty. You know what I'm sayin'?"

While G-Unit will be led by Gargano, Queezzerdeedermeyer said it will have backing from SGA presidential candidate Cornelius Nugent, SGA Senate Speaker Jared Nokes and noted Collegian ball-buster Rene Gonzalez.

"It's a brotherhood of love getting together to be a brotherhood of thugs," Queezzerdeedermeyer said. "Personally, I think that's pretty damn hot. The three of them are all so damn ugly, who could possibly get more thugged out on this campus? We'll just have to get rid of Nugent's stupid fluffy sideburns and Rene's stupid hat."

J-Lo promised a "bun-shakin', booty-quakin', fun lovin', good time."

"How can you go wrong? It's you, me and my ass shakin' for you," J-Lo said. "Oh yeah, and G-Unit will be there, too."

G-UNIT AND J.LO

The Vice Chancellor and Chancellor of the University of Massachusetts hope to entertain the student body at the Mullins Center and bring a fresh new face to the Spring Concert repertoire.

Truck drivers demand compensation from hats

Nabisco truck driver and Pittsfield native Earl Billy Bob Dicks is fed up.

As he walks through the Holyoke Mall with his wife, he is astonished by what he sees. In the window of one of the stores his wife describes as "that's where the kids like to shop," a baseball cap of sorts is spotlighted like it was a star on the red carpet.

This Von Dutch trendy trucker hat costs $65.

A curved brim, a foam-like front panel that reads "Tommy Rocket's Chop Shop," and of course a sea of mesh compiling the final four panels — all held together by plastic buttons — is in his line of vision.

His eyes filled with curiosity lead him to the price tag sitting next to this so-called "mesh hat." The small white piece of paper reads 65 dollars.

And that is the motivation behind the Supreme Court case surrounding the Interchangeable.

It's not a word musicians often want to have attached to their names, unless of course the musicians in question are members of the ever-growing male singer-songwriter clan. Among the clan are card-carrying members John Mayer, Jason Mraz, Howie Day, Matt Nathanson and the founding father, Dave Matthews. For these undistinguishable men, transposability has been a bit of a saving grace.

"Shit, I remember when I first started out I had no music and no fans," said guitar virtuoso Howie Day, fluffing his spiky golden locks. "I just put a huge picture of John Mayer outside and covered his stuff for a while. I figured no one would know the difference."

Not only did they not notice, fans went crazy for the Mayer-esque sound, skyrocketing Day to near-fame in a matter of just a few years.

And Mayer himself had been capitalizing off of the success of Dave Matthews since he started playing guitar professionally. "People thought I kinda sounded like him and I already knew the words to all the songs," said Mayer. "I spent many hours staring into the mirror, studying my perfect bone structure and singing along to 'Crash into Me.'"

Nathanson, the newest member of the male singer-songwriter clan, sees the similarities as more of a novelty. "I don't know if we really sound THAT similar but if I have to be compared to some one, I am glad it's guys that are as good looking as I am."

Yet with the influx of Internet download sites and the decrease of compact disc sales these singer-song writers saw their interchangeable status as a detriment, for the first time.

"i remember when I first released my CD no one was buying it," said Jason Mraz, who likes to think of himself as a 'Hugh Grant with a guitar' type singer-songwriter. "I did some investigating and found that a lot of people though they already had my album when really they were rocking out to [Day's] 'Australia' or [Nathanson's] 'Beneath These Fireworks.'"

It was at that time, about four months ago, that John Mayer got the idea. He, as well as Mraz, Day, Nathanson and Matthews, would join together. Yet it wouldn't be in the form of a tour or a compilation album. The idea was to create one super singer-song writer, combining all the best attributes of the musicians into one guy who could sing some generic songs and pull off the gelled hair look.

"I figured we are all the same so why not come together and do something that the people would enjoy," said Mayer. "If they even noticed."

The idea first came to Mayer when he was watching an old episode of "Captain Planet." "Remember how all-their powers combined to create him? I just thought that was really beautiful," Mayer said.

And so the process began. With the help of stem cell research and the top medical minds in the world, the conjoining of these six men began.

"It was like a huge singer-songwriter orgy," one unidentified doctor exclaimed.

After two brutal months in surgery and two month of recovery, the super singer-songwriter was born. Though there are still debates about he name, tour dates are being announced soon.

Before going in for surgery, Mayer expressed his hopes for the merger.

"I would like to think this will save our fans some time and make it a little less confusing for all the 13-year-old girls trying so desperately to keep track of us."

This art is wicked whack

By Dominic Vovkavich

The Pioneer Valley has made a name for itself as a home to artists of all sorts, ranging from novelists and poets to abstract painters and interpretive dancers. This rich artistic history was the topsoil that nourished perhaps the most talented artist to ever emerge from Western Massachusetts, Vigo Horratio U. born Samuel Davidson.

U born and reared in Northampton grew up in a rather alternative environment.

"My parents did not believe in restriction and they allowed me to find myself, so to speak, in my own time," said U.

Having never attended any official education facility he was self-taught-home-schooled until the age of 35.

U explained, "I felt that I had learned everything that I could from myself, and that it was time to show the world my art."

And that is exactly what he plans to do. This Friday through Sunday U will display his unique work in the basement gallery of the Mind's Eye Collective in South Hadley.

"I combined my knowledge of chemistry, narcotics, and my creativity in every installment. I feel that their transparent weightiness speaks to something of the void inside each of us," said U.

U's artwork consists of two-dozen plexiglass cubes each with at different volatile compound of hallucinogenic-laced aerosol compounds. Gallery patrons will be encouraged to inhale each installation and experience its unique affects.

"You never know this way. My art comes through in a different way to each person. My only concern is that people will try to see things outside of the boxes and then it will no longer be my art," said U. "My art is not always just a visual experience. I have had many people hear, feel, smell and event taste the art before. It is a great thing to see, everyone has such a great time."

Patrons are asked to make a $50 donation at the door; this fee will go to cover the cost of crash mat, munchies, and potential ambulance fees.

Truckers want cash from trendy hats

Massachusetts Union of Truck Drivers' vie for the copyrights on the style of the trendy trucker hat.

"Those stupid-ass kids don't know what they are doing, wearing it all to the side like a hoodlum," Carl Stone, union representative and Magic Meats driver, told the The Daily Riot-gram yesterday before hearing began. "We created it, originated it and do it, don't mess around with what makes us proud."

Trendy trucker hats have been the biggest wave to hit the fashion industry since 150 dollar ripped and bleached Diesel jeans. The style itself has become extremely universal as well. Everyone from hipsters to meatheads are into the scene. Even sports franchises have created trucker hats with the team logos across the front.

But what is bothering the truckers themselves is the fact that people are paying large sums of cash for this style and they — the ones who formulated the style back in the early 1980s — are not being fairly compensated.

Van Dutch, the leading merchant of trendy trucker hats, sells the caps for an average of 65 dollars with the suede edition going for 85 dollars.

MUTD is look to gain 60 percent of the revenue of every hat sold — including the ones bought at vintage clothing stores.

"I love how for so many years people were ashamed of the mesh, like it was some sort of ugly thing," Stone said. "Now this Ashton Kutcher asshole wears it and every stupid college-kid is on the bandwagon."

"We stuck by the mesh, we love the mesh, we are the mesh."

God jumps on the profit train

Spurred by the success of the hugely profitable film "The Passion of the Christ" and its hit soundtrack album and tie-in nail necklaces, God has decided to star in his own ABC variety special, along with co-host Jessica Simpson. "The Jessie and God Variety Hour," scheduled to air in May, will also feature comedian Jay Mohr and hip-hop party act Black Eyed Peas. In addition, Billy Graham and political lecturer Noam Chomsky, who will duet with Simpson on a song, are scheduled to appear.

Along with the ABC special, God has also announced that he will design a line of jewelry in the coming months. Nail earrings and bracelets will soon be available, along with a new cologne scent, called Resurrection.

"God saw how doggedly Hollywood was marketing his supposedly religious epic and turning it into a profit-making machine by exploiting the goodwill of Christians everywhere. He just decided he needed some of that action," said a rep for the Deity.

FCC cracks down on indecency

FCC Commissioner Michael Powell has announced a crack-down on indecency on television and radio.

"We have spent too long watching obscenity flourish over the airwaves," said Powell, prior to ripping off his shirt to reveal a sunburst nipple clamp. "We must, as a nation, rise up against such displays so that adults everywhere cannot see or hear what they want to."

Powell said that the FCC will seek to ban vulgar displays of nudity, violence and foul language. "Shows like 'Survivor,' 'Paradise Hotel' and 'The NBC Nightly News' traffic in foul, immoral attitudes that have no place being shown in a free country. We must use the guise of protecting our kids in order to prevent adults from being exposed to adult-materials." Fines will be raised ten-fold for anyone who breaks one of the FCC's new rules.

"Let's see the righteous, self-made Saint Bono give to charity next time he drops the f-bomb at an awards show," Powell said.

Paris Hilton selling out?

COURTESY PARIS HILTON, '06

Paris Hilton likes hot dogs.

Fans of skinny blonde socialite bimbo Paris Hilton are in an outrage over her recent addition to the cast of the horror film "House of Wax," now in production, and her plans to record a pop album.

"How could she do this?" wailed 17-year-old Cary LeGrant when informed of Hilton's plans. "Why isn't she just staying a rich debutante? I liked her before, when she was famous for just being famous. Now she's actually trying to be a legitimate celebrity? I'm disgusted. She dashed my dreams of being a celebrity just because I'm skinny and blonde."

Another fan, who wished to remain anonymous, sighed, "I can't believe she's doing a stupid teen horror flick after she gave such a forceful, heartfelt performance in that other film she did. She's going from a gritty, independent European art film to a dumb studio film? What a sellout."

Micah Brand: more than just waste of basketball talent

As good as David West

Man y'all know I got a bad rap at UMass even though I was the shit while I was here. People called me, "the next Camby," and I said, "Hell naw, I'm the first Micah."

Y'all remember me, don't you? I was the dude that romped down the court, grabbed the boards and dunked that shit so hard that Lou Roe could feel it in his teeth.

Me and my boys ran the A-10, no one could hold us down. At first It was me, Crooks, and Kit tearing the hell outa those fools. They thought, "Oh we got talent, we must be good," and I said, "Hell no! You don't need no talent to be good in the A-10, you just gotta look good in the uniform."

And that's just what I did.

After the Celtics cut me before I made It into the Fleet Center, I started my own clothing company, "Brand that Ass," and let me tell you, no one can Brand an ass like me.

It was a simple idea at the time. I was just looking at my hot self on the front of last year's Hoops Magazine, and I thought, "Damn, that boy should put out some fly threads just so others can look this good!"

At first Brand that Ass only put out shorts, you know, so you could have the Brand on your ass, get it? It was hot, I had all the bitches and they were loving my fly game, everybody wanted a little Brand on their ass.

I was looking for a face to put my Brand on and figured if I wanted to get my product out there, I needed the biggest badonkadonk in the chicken coop. And let me tell you, when the chickens come a cluckin', Micah comes a buckin'.

The ladies were all over the place. I had asses on top of asses just looking to be Branded. I did the UMass thing, but what I really wanted was Jen Butler, I wanted a big old billboard to put my shorts on.

I saw her outside the Mullins Center and introduced the idea by giving her a big five-finger discount on her caboose. She took one look, smiled, and knocked the shit out of me.

It hurt, but I had another idea all planned out. Me and Steve Lappas always talked about going into business together so I went to his office with a pair of my little ass shorts and told him, "Baby, it's your time to shine."

Steve's face lit up like a bong in Puffton at 4:20 in the afternoon. He scampered into the closet, hiked up the shorts, and for good measure put on his infamous mullet wig. I took one look, pointed, and said, "A star is born."

The way those striped purple daisy duke shorts looked on that small ugly man made me realize that there was so much opportunity out there. The first commercial was poetry In motion, his milky white legs sold me over 10,000 pairs in just one week.

The idea was simple, have him lie In a bed of rose petals, turn around seductively, and say the catch phrase, "Sure I look good, but there is only one clothing line that can Brand that Ass."

We're still on the road, but I had to write this to let you know that the Brand ship hasn't sunk just yet. Next time you go to the store looking for something to hike up your haunches remember there is only one way to, Brand that Ass.

So for those of you out there that aren't really good at what you do, there is a message to my story. Stay in school, suck at whatever you're doing just long enough to graduate, then go out and find yourself a small ugly man to make all your money for you.

God bless America.

seen leaving Brand's office, with a visibly shaken Brand unlatching the fortieth story window.

On his way out of the NCAA headquarters, Steinbrenner quickly picked up the four men's golf Major Tournament titles, as well as tennis' U.S. Open, Wimbledon, and the French Open.

"I would have picked up the Australian Open too, but god knows no one watches that waste of time. Hell, I only bought the tennis stuff because I wanted a piece of that Williams sister action."

Steinbrenner capped off his busy day by calling up the owners of all 20 Barclaycard Premiership teams, and is now the owner of England's most prestigious soccer title.

"It wasn't too difficult, most of those guys didn't even know what hit them," Steinbrenner said. "Now, anyone know anything about soccer?"

The reporters in attendance flipped their complimentary NFL logo notebooks over and stared blankly at the new owner of the sporting world.

Manchester United manager Sir Alex Ferguson was briefly upset by the move, telling Steinbrenner to "sod off." But an hour later, he relented.

"I guess it just makes sense," Ferguson said. "As long as the Yankees understand that my Reds will still kick their asses anywhere, anytime. Man U., New York? There's no contest. The Yankees do still suck, after all."

In the Boston Red Sox camp, owner John Henry seemed unfazed by Steinbrenner's moves.

"That's fine," Henry said, whittling a baseball bat from an elephant tusk. "We're still in it. This is just another example of the Evil Empire's conspiracy with God. Damn you God!"

There have been grumblings from his peers such as St. Anthony who claims, "Pete's gone crazy. He treats heaven like it's his own personal nightclub, checking ID and charging a 'three rosary, all you can drink' cover. I remember one thirsty Thursday last month I went out to get a 50-rack but I came back because I forgot my ID. Pete goes, 'I'm gonna need to see some ID.' I said, 'Pete, it's me bro. Just let me in. I lost my ID.' Then he's like, 'Well why don't you pray to yourself and maybe you'll find It. You think for yourself.'"

Apparently St. Peter's most recent temper tantrum was by far his worst. "Pete just went Shuolin Kung-Fu on BC," says one archangel.

According to eyewitness accounts, BC showed up at the Gates at around 3 p.m. yesterday, to which St. Peter responded, "wrong floor bitch."

BC, ever persistent, handed St. Peter the proper documentation and proceeded to account its accidental suicide (see Collegian, April 1, 2002).

Peter stopped it saying, "Who gets killed by themself? If you're walking through Boston and you see yourself holding a gun, run away from yourself. Who's going near themself saying, 'hey, hey is that imminent death?"

another 60-loss season. Sometimes I wonder what he is trying to do more of: lose games or miss games due to injury. That isn't me, though. I want to cut down the nets at the Final Four some year."

Coach Steve Lappas is looking to put last season's 10-19 campaign behind him and said he was thrilled to add a player of this caliber to a young team without many scoring weapons.

"We were a miserable basketball team last year. If there was one thing we did well, it was losing on a consistent basis to bad teams. Hartford High could have beat us if they only dressed four players and handcuffed themselves together," Lappas stated.

Atlantic-10 Rookie of the Year Rashaun Freeman was ecstatic with White's decision to play for the Minutemen.

"Sometimes I felt like I was playing by myself last season. Actually, during the St. Joe's game [Feb. 25], I think I was. We're going to be like Lou Roe and Marcus Camby, except totally different and much better. We'll be closer to Syracuse's version of Carmelo Anthony and Lebron James... Just pretend Lebron James went to Syracuse," Freeman exclaimed.

John Calipari, Camby's coach at UMass, said, "If we had someone like David White during the 1996 NCAA tournament, we would have taken the title home to Amherst. Then, Rick Pitino would have stayed at Kentucky, and he wouldn't have completely destroyed the Celtics' franchise. I wouldn't have left to coach the New Jersey Nets only to destroy their franchise, and Bruiser Flint wouldn't have been promoted to head coach here, which ultimately doomed this program. That's neither here nor there, though."

David White closed out his press conference by making a couple bold predictions. "When I graduate, we will have hung two national championship banners, and we'll keep our program clean. No cash gifts from agents; none of that."

Marcus Camby avoided baby mama drama by supporting his son's decision to play basketball at his almamater.

UMASS Sports Briefs

• Having vacated his post as athletic director at the University of Massachusetts to take an identical position at beleaguered Baylor University, Ian McCaw will now reportedly become the new president of Iraq as he continues his tour of "The Worst Friggin' Jobs in the World."

• Coming off a lower back injury that had kept him out of the University of Massachusetts' previous three playoff games, goaltender Gabe Winer certainly answered the burning question as to whether he should replace backup Tim Warner for the Hockey East Championship game when he recorded a remarkable 59 saves in a 2-1 triple overtime loss to Maine.

A burning question he did not answer, however, is how someone that fat and out of shape can play six consecutive periods of hockey.

• Rumors swirling around the UMass football team have eluded to star running back R.J. Cobbs possibly making the shift to defense for the upcoming 2004 season.

Coach Don Brown was unable to comment on the story due to legal injunction preventing him from being involved with the program, while attempts to reach Cobbs were unsuccessful due to the fact that he is sheltered by the program, as well as UMass media relations, and is goddamned impossible to get a hold of.

• Struggling UMass basketball coach Steve Lappas has set his sights high for what will be his fourth-season in Amherst. Following the restructuring of his contract, which will pay Lappas according to win total and Mullins Center attendance, the former Villanova bench boss has gone on record as saying he will accept nothing less than "another trip to the Atlantic 10 Tournament."

• Sam the Minuteman was brought up on drug charges after police found over 20 ounces of marijuana in his studio apartment in Alpine Village last night. Sam, who was visibly inebriated at the time of the arrest lost his head and could only repeat, "Go, go U, go U Mass, go U Mass!"

Facing distribution charges, Sam chose not to indicate his intended targets when asked by police who would be purchasing the drugs, chosing instead to take the rap for the men's basketba...er...those in question.

• Tennis coach Judy Dixon has voiced her displeasure over the Collegian's lack of coverage for her team's fall and spring seasons. However the veteran coach eventually backed off when it was explained to her that this publication is only inclined to print things people actually give a shit about.

• 10 members of the now-defunct men's water polo team were arrested yesterday after allegedly stealing all of the fencing team's rapiers to overtake and defend the Totman Gymnasium pool.

The group, which they called, "The Ten Amigos," held off students for three hours until Amherst police arrived and had the pool drained. The Ten Amigos, reportedly distraught over the elimination of their sport, immediately surrendered and are currently being held in their Speedos in the AMPD.

• The University of Massachusetts recently sold the stands at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium back to Lego Incorporated. UMass bought the two-piece stadium from Lego in the early eighties, but has decided to instead convert to Lincoln Logs due to budget cuts.

• The UMass dance team has officially challenged the UMass women's softball team to a public drinking match this Saturday night. There will be four events including: one-on-one beer pong, survivor flip-cup, head-to-head keg stands, and the final event... last woman standing using Jaegermeister.

Softball coach Elane Sortino on loves the idea and is looking for a strong finish from her squad. My ladies have been training since September for this , there's been a lot of puke, and a lot of tears, but I won't let them stop," Sortino said, "After all what would softball be if you couldn't out-drink a dancer once in awhile?"

• Following the implosion of Philadelphia's Veterans Stadium to clear space for a parking lot, the UMass athletic department has decided to similarly do away with Earl Lorden Baseball Field to extend the Mullins Center's current parking lot.

In searching for a contractor to complete this task, baseball coach Mike Stone recommended junior closer Scott Ratliff, who has ample experience in implosion.

• In response to controversy that emerged after UMass was denied a first round home game in the NCAA Division I-AA football playoffs, committee chair and former University of Montana athletic director Wayne Hogan was formally charged with fraud and sentenced to spending the rest of his life in Montana.

Upon appealing for leniency in sentencing, Hogan was instead sent to Colgate Memorial Prison in Hamilton, N.Y. where he will be forced to navigate a bus full of football players through a blinding snowstorm, nearly plunge to his death and then lose to a shitty team because the referees suck.

In addition, after the prosecution complained that Hogan's sentence was too lax, it was eventually amended to prevent him from going to Montreal following his stay at Colgate.

NEW YORK — The New York Yankees can now officially say that they are the champions of the world.

Owner George Steinbrenner bought every major sports championship in existence yesterday, in a bold move of revenue hoarding that has the sports world up in arms.

"I just figured this was the natural course of things, so why not speed up the process?" Steinbrenner asked reporters in a dingy basement room at Yankee Stadium. "And seriously, it's not like there's any competition. After I bought, er, signed Alex Rodriguez, I think it became pretty clear that the point of playing the games in every sport, let alone baseball, is moot."

The process began early yesterday morning, when Steinbrenner called Major League Baseball commissioner Bud Selig. Steinbrenner asked Selig to give him the 2004 World Series title for $4 million.

"I was expecting the call," Selig said. "It's become a ritual for us, George calls me around this time every year, and most years I give it some serious consideration. Some years, of course, I completely refuse, because, hey, screw you George. But this year, it just made sense. They've already made me on the steroid thing, what's the point of pretending that baseball is fair?"

Steinbrenner, encouraged by the ease of his first transaction, began calling the other commissioners. The NHL's Gary Bettman folded his hand quickly. "Seriously guys? We're so screwed next season, what's the point? I almost gave him the 2003-04 title too, but I figured he might as well field a team for that one," he said.

At press time, Steinbrenner had not confirmed the entry of the Yankees into the NHL playoffs.

Next was the NBA, where David Stern was at first apprehensive, but then relented after Steinbrenner agreed to throw in an extra $250 million for Carmelo Anthony and LeBron James, bringing the NBA title price tag to $250 million and 50 cents.

NFL Commissioner Paul Tagliabue agreed to Steinbrenner's terms at noon. Steinbrenner insisted that in addition to the $400 million price tag for the 2005 Super Bowl title, the NFL also cease to own any TV rights, as the league was Steinbrenner's only competition for the crucial "bandwagon sports fan" demographic.

From noon until 1 p.m., Steinbrenner had lunch with Donald Trump on top of the Statue of Liberty's head, and then whipped out his cell phone to call no less than 100 commissioners and governors, securing the NASCAR Nextel Cup Championship — with the Microsoft 666 car — as well as the 2006 and 2010 World Cups, which he got in a two-for-one deal with a rebate from Target. He then opened up his phone book to talk to the NCAA, and within 15 minutes was the sole possessor of every college championship through 2015 — except football.

"Are you kidding me?" Steinbrenner said. "I wouldn't touch that worthless frigging thing with a 10-foot pole. Have you seen the trophy? Holy hell, there are prettier sculptures in my stool every morning than that piece of Waterford Crystal gone horribly wrong. Not to mention the fact that it has no value. Two championships? What the crap is that?"

After finishing with his verbal asswhipping of NCAA president Myles Brand — a tirade which invoked, among other things, Satan, Brand's mother, former Alabama football coach Mike Price, former Colorado kicker Kate Hnida, and every member of the Division I-AA Football Selection Committee — Steinbrenner was

Camby's son signs with UM

By Doctor Jay
RIOT!-gram staff

This may come as a shock to many people across the country; especially to the Division I powerhouse programs he turned down, but in a statement released today, David White announced he is signing with the University of Massachusetts men's basketball team.

White, the illegitimate son of former Minuteman star Marcus Camby, verbally committed to the University of Connecticut last month, but reneged to play for his father's alma mater.

"I just wanted a chance to continue the legacy my old man started at this school back in the 1990s," White stated at a press conference in Amherst yesterday. "Except I plan on being better. He was alright, but I want all of Julius Erving's records."

There was always some question as to whether Camby was legitimately White's illegitimate father, but it was finally proven three years ago at Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston. Dr. Edward Flood matched their DNA together along with White's mother, Sarah White.

"My tests are absolutely, 100 percent accurate. My tests proved that OJ [Simpson]'s glove was too small and that Pete Rose not only bet on baseball, but did so while standing on second base. There is no doubt that Marcus Camby and Sarah White are David's parents," Dr. Flood said during a phone interview yesterday.

Camby said he met Sarah after a basketball game between East Hartford Middle School and West Hartford Middle School when he was in the sixth grade. "I just threw down 32 points on West Hartford, and I could tell she was eyeing me. She was a cheerleader in the eighth grade for the West and was outside our locker room after the game when I met her. That's just how I do my business," Camby said.

Sarah White went on to comment about the night she met Camby in 1986.

"I just knew that he was going to be rich one day. I heard the whispers in the hallway outside of my eighth grade social studies class about some player for the East. They said he was going pro some day. He was my ticket out of Hartford," she announced with a prideful grin.

David White is 6-foot-10 and weighs 225 pounds, which is similar to Camby's frame when he played for UMass. He is coming off a senior season in which he posted 36.8 points, 15.1 rebounds and 6.5 blocks per game for Hartford High School. He was the top-rated senior in America last season, and he showed why when he scored 42 points at the McDonald's All-American Game on Tuesday night.

White said he is focused on accomplishing what his father couldn't.

"I just want to win," he said. "My dad could never win the big one. He's not even a winner now. Look at the teams he has played for: Toronto, New York and Denver. If Detroit didn't have a brain fart this year, my dad wouldn't have Carmelo Anthony to save him from

No eternity

God kicks BC out for being pathetic

By Octy Nine
RIOT!-gram staff

BOSTON — Despite Boston College's countless pleas to get into Heaven, God signed a bill yesterday forbidding BC eternal life, a spokesman of Our Lord said yesterday.

The bill, which can now be seen as Psalm 151 in your Bible (thanks to Heaven Technologies, Inc.), specifically entails that Boston College stay at least 100 yards from The Gates at all times, until expiration in Purgatory.

This action comes only four days after BC's rejection from Hell, a decision The Devil said "was as easy as running a weekly student newspaper." Lucifer also listed overconfidence and whining as factors for the rebuff.

Though God did not release an official reckoning for his decision, sources close to The Almighty said the banishment stems from an incident in a Boston church three years ago this month involving Host mockery. The FBI said yesterday it responded to requests from Heaven authorities to recover specific tapes from the church's security system.

In an exclusive interview with Moses, who was wearing only a "Yankees and Red Sox Both Suck" shirt, underneath a Jedi Robe at his water-floored apartment on the West Side, it was brought to light, literally, with one wave of his left hand, that BC had been despondent with the freshness of The Body of Christ upon consumption. Boston College, Moses says, is caught on camera, nudging an adjacent female, saying, "somebody better check the date on that Lord."

Jesus, who is interning as his Father's spokesman, said yesterday at a 3 p.m. press conference that "he has never felt fresher."

"I've showered twice a day ever since I can remember," said The Son of God, who recently signed a $55.5 million endorsement deal with Old Spice to promote its new body wash product. "I feel divine."

As of press time BC had failed to return repeated phone calls and according to its voice mail, was busy playing badminton with judas.

This is not the first time the "cleanliness of the Christ" has been questioned, most recently by President George W. Bush who claimed "there's a pube in my Christ Chex."

To that, St. Peter responded, "the Holy Penis is clean."

The President has since moved to more traditional snack foods, such as pretzels, and had limited success. Meanwhile, due to repeated public outbursts, St. Peter has been unable to escape the microscope of the Holy

$3.2 M grant funds polymer research

By Adrienne Bossi
Collegian Staff

The U.S. Department of Defense has awarded a group of University of Massachusetts researchers to work on technology research that may some day allow the storage of 20 DVDs on a chip the size of a quarter.

This three-year grant, funded by the Multidisciplinary University Research Initiative (MURI), aims at creating new materials with huge storage capacities that can be used in a variety of ways. The UMass researchers are paired with scientists from at the University of Pittsburgh and the University of South Carolina.

Thomas Russell, a UMass professor of polymer science and engineering along with a team of 25 researchers, has proposed a way that may make this DVD dream a reality.

Scientists have determined compounds, called polymers, that form shapes similar to the honeycombs of a beehive (among other shapes). Polymers are extremely small, up to 10,000 times smaller than a strand of hair. There are millions of honeycombs in each polymer and each little honeycomb can be used to store information, magnetic charges and electrical charges.

The problem is, it is impossible to keep track of the individual honeycombs because they are so small and because there are so many in one polymer.

Russell, the principle researcher for the grant, has proposed a way to give manageable sized groups of these honeycombs an address. By binding them with viruses, which have manageable shapes and great binding capabilities, the polymer honeycombs will be easier to work with.

"We are beginning to grasp new ways to couple the two (polymers and viruses) to produce new classes of materials," said Russell. "Nobody has done this before. Nobody knows how yet."

The virus's that will be used in research are the cowpea mosaic virus and horse spleen ferritin. Russell hopes the viruses would act as tags. If specific groups of honeycombs can be tagged, their storage capabilities can become much more specialized. When that happens, a whole new door opens in various fields.

For example, these hybrid materials could be used creating smaller and higher charged batteries. The electric charges could be put into a paper-thin patch of Russell's polymer hybrids that could be strong enough to save a heart attack patient. Or, a small patch of these new materials could carry a large dose of medicine on it. These materials could be specialized to react to certain changes in the environment, like when PH levels drop in water, or pollution levels rise in the air.

"The possibilities are limitless," said Russell, "This really is amazing."

Two additional years of funding are possible under this program totaling a potential award of $5.3 million. The UMass project is one of 31 research projects nationwide selected by the Pentagon for funding under the MURI program.

Election snafu brews confusion

SGA Speaker Jared Nokes moderates a meeting Wednesday night that debated the results of the presidential elections, which were ruled unconstitutional. Nokes was later sworn in as interim president and will serve until the next president is sworn in.

Look for next race uncertain

By Dan Lamothe

With the Student Government Association's elections rejected in two different ways late Wednesday night, SGA members and candidates affected by the decisions pondered yesterday what their moves are next.

"I feel like right now we could be working on our text book campaign, or working to get more credits for classes, or working to improve funding," said Eduardo Bustamante after losing his claim to the SGA presidency. "In that sense, it's disappointing. We're going to be spending $5,000 more in student money [to run another election]."

Bustamante watched as Speaker of the Senate Jared Nokes was sworn in as an interim SGA president after 1:30 a.m. Thursday morning after the Senate voted 24-21 against ratification of the elections. The Student Judiciary also issued a preliminary ruling at the Senate meeting, with Chief Justice Marina Grulon saying the elections were unconstitutional because of the Instant Runoff format that was used.

The Judiciary is expected to issue a more detailed version of the ruling this afternoon.

"There's a lot of people who have come up to me and said, 'Man, you were robbed,'" Bustamante said.

Elections Commissioner Steven Hoeschele said the next set of elections will be held on April 26 and 29. All forms of student government on the ballots March 24 and 25 will be included, including races for the presidency, trustee seat, and area governments.

The presidential and trustee elections could potentially be different, with several candidates who were on the ballot last week unsure if they will run again at the end of the month. Presidential candidate Mark Morrison and past SGA president David Carr have already announced they will not run again, and several other candidates said they have not decided what they will do.

"I have not made up my mind yet," presidential candidate Brian Long told The Collegian last night.

By SGA rule, no additional candidates can be added to the ballot for the election, but candidates can choose to drop out.

While Hoeschele hinted Wednesday night that he may file an appeal on the Judiciary's ruling after he is able to read the detailed version this afternoon, he said last night that there are only a few instances in which he could appeal.

"I need to digest it first," he said of his possible decision to repeal.

Bustamante said he and trustee candidate Matthew Murphy would definitely be running together again in the next election, and said the amount of conflicts of interests involved in the case is frustrating.

"If we can't even hold one election right, it makes it seem like our inner politics get in the way of making this a better school," Bustamante said.

Bustamante said he expects presidential candidates Patrick Higgins and Tim Daly to run again, but wasn't sure about the other candidates. Higgins could not be reached for comment last night.

Nokes said yesterday he was surprised by the way people at the Senate meeting acted. The meeting was packed until well after midnight, with more than 100 angry students, many supporting Bustamante as president, remaining.

Stolen bell returned to Old Chapel

By Melissa Blanksteen
Collegian Staff

Bells are ringing in the University of Massachusetts Old Chapel once again after the smallest bell in the new $57,147 set of chapel bells was returned yesterday.

The bell was returned sometime yesterday afternoon after being stolen, said Molly Hayes, band manager of the Minuteman Marching Band, allegedly by a band member. The bell has since been installed along with the other bells.

Richard Nathhorst, alumnus from 1979 and the Capital Project Manager at UMass, said the person who stole the bell could be found guilty on counts of grand theft, destruction of University property, and breaking and entry in the nighttime.

The theft of the smallest bell was discovered Monday when technicians from the Netherlands came to install the bells. It weighs 24 pounds, stands 5.65 inches tall, and is 8.03 inches in diameter. The bells were cast in the Netherlands at the Royal Eijsbouts Foundry.

Thirty new bells were delivered to the Old Chapel on Thursday, March 25, Nathorst said. They would complete the 42-bell UMass Four Octave Carillon. A carillon is a stationary set of bells in a tower that are usually played with a keyboard.

"This is a catastrophe!" Nathhorst wrote in an email to the Minuteman marching band on Monday evening, upon the discovery of the missing bell. The new bells are to be used in a concert performed by George Matthew, Middlebury College Carrillonneur in the Chapel at the UMass alumni reunion and dedication ceremony to the bells on June 5.

The Henry Vincent Couper Estate bought the new bells, at the expense of the estate of the Alumnus of the class of 1937.

Nathhorst offered a $250 dollar reward, as well as filing a report with the UMass Police Department. He believed that a student might have seen the bells being delivered on the front steps of the Chapel.

"I am hoping that someone saw something or heard someone bragging about the prank or might see the bell dumped somewhere on campus," Nathhorst wrote.

The Old Chapel served as the marching band headquarters for many years. It has been closed since 1998 after a problem was detected with the steeple. The Old Chapel was built in 1884. Once the steeple was discovered to be in disrepair, the band was forced to move out.

Palestinians pressed to prevent terror

By Josef Federman
Associated Press

JERUSALEM (AP) — American diplomats told skeptical Palestinian officials Thursday that Israel's plan to pull out of the Gaza Strip brings an opportunity to revive the "road map" peace initiative, but they said future progress would depend on a Palestinian crackdown on militants.

The U.S. envoys delivered the message in a meeting with Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia in the West Bank town of Jericho. The team then had two hours of talks with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, but no details were disclosed.

In another development, Sharon said Israel might move against Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat in the future, Israel TV reported. Sharon made the remark during a series of news interviews ahead of next week's Jewish holiday of Passover.

"Arafat cannot be so sure of himself in his place," the Internet Web site of the Yediot Ahronot daily quoted Sharon as saying.

Arafat has been confined to his West Bank headquarters for more than two years. Several months ago Israel's Cabinet declared that Arafat is responsible for violence and should be "removed."

Sharon has proposed pulling Israeli troops and settlers out of Gaza and small parts of the West Bank. He says the Palestinian government is not a partner for peace talks and that a unilateral withdrawal is necessary to protect Israeli interests.

The American team is in the region to discuss Sharon's plan, which he will present to President Bush in Washington on April 14.

The Palestinians want assurances the plan will be the first step toward a larger withdrawal from the West Bank, while Israel is seeking American support for limits on future Palestinian demands.

Sociology students to help UMass budget

By Aleena Bando
Collegian Correspondent

A new class at the University is using a hands-on approach to solve the UMass budget crisis.

This spring, "Crisis in Higher Education", a new sociology class offered by the University, is giving students the opportunity to step outside the classroom and apply their knowledge to real-world situations.

On April 14 and 15, students will take buses to the Statehouse in Boston to speak with legislators about their concerns for the University and the urgent need for more funding for the UMass system.

"The University is something I care deeply about, and it's being fundamentally transformed," said Professor Dan Clawson, who is pioneering this semester's class, along with graduate teaching assistants Hilton Kelly and Brian Kapitulik.

Clawson has worked with the University since 1978, and has extensive experience with grassroots organization. He has worked closely with both the Save UMass campaign and the Faculty Union, as well as being a noteworthy name in the area of Labor Movements. In his classroom, Clawson has welcomed guest speakers who are experts on everything from the economics of the higher education system to the pros and cons of online degrees to give lectures and lead class discussions.

On April 7, the students in Clawson's class will receive an in-class training session, which will prepare and guide them with what to say to legislators on Lobby Day.

"This is the first time we've brought this number of students with careful preparation into lobby," says Clawson.

The Save UMass campaign, which Clawson led two years ago, brought about 700 students to the Statehouse, but only about 100 to actually speak with legislators.

Economics department chair Nancy Folbre, who was the first guest speaker, created a metaphor to help students better understand their situation. If you throw a frog in boiling water, she explained, it will jump out immediately. If you put a frog in lukewarm water and put it over a source of heat, the frog's body will continue to adapt to the rising temperature until it is too late and it can do nothing to save itself from boiling to death.

Folbre related this to the students who were growing accustomed to the budget cuts and fewer resources at the University — the frogs represent the students, growing accustomed to fewer resources and larger class sizes.

A publication printed by The Massachusetts Taxpayers Foundation on Nov. 24, 2003 said, "In a striking outcome of the deliberations on this year's budget, the state in 2004 will for the first time in decades spend more on jails and prisons than on public higher education."

Clawson said last year was the biggest year for budget cuts and tuition increases, and this means that people pay more out of their own pockets for education, which filters out the amount of people who can afford higher education.

March 31, 2004

Members of the student body,

As many of you are aware, the Student Government Association elections took place on March 24 and 25. On March 3, the elections commission decided to conduct these elections under the Instant Runoff Voting process. On March 5, I filed a petition with the Student Judiciary to determine if this voting process was legal.

The Student Judiciary conducted a hearing on Tuesday and determined that Instant Runoff Voting was unconstitutional. As such, the Student Government Association will be conducting new elections for its President, Trustee, and Area Governments in late April. In the meantime, I will be serving as your President, which is required by the SGA Constitution.

Throughout this past year, there has been a lot of controversy related to the SGA. Most of this controversy has included me and usually the Office of ALANA affairs or the ALANA Caucus. To those that seem skeptical of my sudden rise to the Presidency, despite the election of an ALANA Caucus President, I do not blame you. However, your skepticism is undeserved. The IRV format was proven to be illegal and so the elections must be done again. As I mentioned earlier, I filed my petition prior to any vote being cast. Mark Morrison, our Attorney General, had been fighting the implementation of IRV back in October, when the Senate decided to confirm Chancellor Hoeschele to the elections commission.

While I will only be in office until the next elections are ratified, I want to assure all of you that I will do my best to represent the undergraduate population of this campus. Despite our differences on some issues, I believe we share the same side of most issues as we have one overriding factor in common: we are all students.

Should you have any questions, please contact the SGA at 5-0342, or you can contact me directly by e-mail, sga.president@stuaf.umass.edu

Thank you,

Israelies bound to treaty

After Thursday's meeting, Qureia said he would welcome an Israeli pullback from Gaza, but only if it is part of the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan.

The road map aims to bring about an independent Palestinian state by next year but has been stalled for months amid violations by Israel and the Palestinians.

Qureia said he sought assurances the Gaza plan would not prejudice future talks on a permanent settlement, including the status of the West Bank and Jerusalem and the fate of millions of Palestinian refugees who claim property in what is now Israel.

"Unilateralism is not the solution," Qureia said. "The only thing that will help and bring forth Palestinian commitments is to negotiate with the Palestinians."

Palestinian Cabinet minister Saeb Erekat said the Americans believe Sharon's plan is an opportunity to revive the road map. "They see it as part of the road map, and not as a substitute to the road map," he said.

However, he said, the U.S. diplomats made it clear they expect the Palestinians to honor their road map obligations — particularly the requirement to dismantle violent groups that have killed hundreds of Israelis in the past three years.

The American diplomats — White House officials Steve Hadley and Elliot Abrams, and State Department Mideast envoy William Burns — did not comment after the meeting. But earlier, American officials said they would be telling both sides that Sharon's plan has to be consistent with the road map.

"We don't see unilateral disengagement as a replacement for the road map. It's a way to jump start the road map," one official said on condition of anonymity. Israel officially remains committed to the road map. But it, too, has failed to meet its interim obligations of freezing settlement construction in the West Bank and Gaza.

Newspapers catch heat over photos

By Seth Sutel
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Gruesome front page photos showing the charred remains of U.S. citizens killed in an ambush in Iraq prompted complaints from some readers that the images were too graphic.

The New York Times, Miami Herald and USA Today said they received a moderate number of complaints from irate or offended readers about the prominent use of the photos.

USA Today spokeswoman Heidi Henderson said the paper received 20 e-mails and a dozen phone calls that were largely critical of the decision to use the photo. She said the newspaper planned to print some of the responses in the letters-to-the-editor section of Friday's paper.

The Miami Herald front page editor Liza Gross said executive editor Tom Fiedler planned to write a column for Sunday's paper explaining the process that editors go through in making such decisions.

"We have been saying that these decisions were not made lightly, and that we discarded many more gruesome (photos). But our responsibility is to present the facts as they are," Gross said.

The Boston Herald also used a photo of the bridge scene on its front page Thursday, along with an editors' note saying: "The body of the U.S. citizen in the photo has been intentionally darkened using Photoshop to obscure the graphic content."

Managing editor Andrew Gully said the newspaper received about 35 complaints from readers about the photos, but that amount was "light" and less than the paper had been expecting.

As for obscuring the photo, Gully said: "It's a matter of degree. You want to give as much as you can without going over the line."

The four victims were civilians working for a U.S. security company. Jubilant Iraqi residents dragged two of the charred corpses through the streets before stringing them up on the bridge. Video of the scene was aired widely on non-U.S. television stations, but American TV producers held back.

Bush signs bill making fetus harm a crime

By Jennifer Loven
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Accompanied by grieving families, President Bush on Thursday signed into law new protections for the unborn that for the first time make it a separate federal crime to harm a fetus during an assault on the mother.

"If the crime is murder and the unborn child's life ends, justice demands a full accounting under the law," Bush said before signing the measure, a major priority for many of the president's most loyal political supporters. "The suffering of two victims can never equal only one offense."

Abortion-rights proponents, meanwhile, called the measure an assault on reproductive freedom because it represents the first recognition of federal legal rights for an embryo or fetus as a person separate from the woman.

An exuberant audience of abortion foes cheered the president during his remarks, while a few of the family members who shared the East Room stage wiped away tears. Included in the group were the mother and stepfather of California murder victim Laci Peterson, who was eight months pregnant when she died in December 2002 in a highly publicized case.

Bush devoted a large share of his speech to the loss of "a beautiful young woman who was joyfully awaiting the arrival of a new son." Peterson's mother, Sharon Rocha, and stepfather, Ron Grunski, looked on.

"All who knew Laci Peterson have mourned two deaths. And the law cannot look away and pretend there was just one," Bush said.

The president met privately with the family members before the ceremony, Bush's first major bill-signing event of 2004.

But the new law wouldn't apply to crimes such as that in the Peterson case. It applies only to harm to a fetus while a federal crime, such as a terrorist attack or drug-related shooting, is being committed against the pregnant mother. The legislation defines an "unborn child" as a child in utero "any stage of development."

Over two dozen states have similar laws, including California where Peterson's husband, Scott, is being tried on double murder charges and could face the death penalty if convicted.

People on both sides of the fetal rights and abortion issues have said the new law, which passed by a 245-163 vote in the House and a 61-38 vote in the Senate, will have far-reaching consequences.

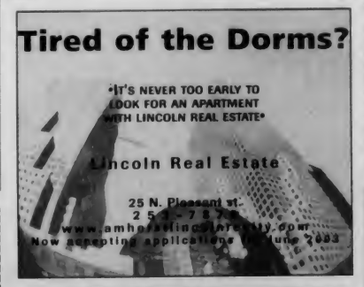
Election to tap student funds again hadn't thrown out the case," Nokes said. "When the judiciary had already thrown it out, I was very surprised to see people show up anyway. Had we passed the election report, Sen. Bustamante would have been president for less than 40 hours. There was no benefit to Eddie being president."

Nokes said the cost to run a second election will be about $3,000, something he feels needs to be taken in context with the SGA's $4 million budget.

"For us to elect another president with legitimacy ... $3,000 is a very reasonable price," he said.

Nokes also took out an $800, full-page advertisement on Page Two of today's Collegian to publish a letter to the student body. Submitted to The Collegian Wednesday, the advertisement in part addresses skepticism people in the campus community may have about his rise to the presidency, even on an interim basis.



"Throughout this year, there has been a lot of controversy related to the SGA," Nokes says in the letter. "Most of this controversy has included me and usually the Office of ALANA Affairs or the ALANA Caucus. To those who seem skeptical of my sudden rise to presidency. I do not blame. However, your skepticism is undeserved."

Nokes said he wasn't sure if the money for the advertisement came from the SGA's student fees fund.

Bustamante, a former ALANA Caucus senator, said it will be interesting to see what Nokes does in the next three weeks while he is president. Bustamante also plans to start holding the "Back to the People" community meetings he promised as a part of his campaign platform even though he is not the president. The first meeting will be held on Tuesday at 6:30 p.m. in Worcester Dining Commons.

"I do believe we are the legitimate president and trustee of this campus," Bustamante said of himself and Murphy. "But there's an election in a month. I think [the presidency and trustee seat] guaranteed with time."

EDITORIAL OPINION

FRIDAY, APRIL 2, 2004 EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Student elections debacle a disgrace

As the Student Government Association's Senate meeting stretched well past 1 a.m. last night, only one thing became increasingly clear.

For the umpteenth time, student government at the University of Massachusetts has failed the student body.

The SGA Student Judiciary is all but certain to rule today that last week's student government elections were unconstitutional by the SGA's rules. The SGA Senate has already failed to ratify the election's results. Speaker of the Senate Jared Nokes has already been sworn in as student body president for at least the next three week, until another election can be held.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian finds all of it deplorable. With the student body finally showing some legitimate interest in the electoral process of student government for the first time in several years, the SGA undermined a golden opportunity to seize credibility, alienating thousands of students, and potentially voters, in the process.

There are many people at fault for it. The Senate as a whole. Chancellor of Elections Steven Hoeschle and his staff, Nokes — all of them played some role in the failure of student government serving the people.

There are many victims in the failure of the SGA to run an efficient, clean election last week, and first and foremost is the students. With nearly 2,800 students exercising their civic duty at the polls, turnout at the election was better than it has been in several years. Turnout being high can be attributed to a number of reasons, including several candidates mobilizing students to vote, and many students taking issue with some of what has gone on in student government this year.

Regardless of intent, the Senate's failure to ratify election results after allowing the new instant run-off voting format in question now to be used it effectively shows some students that their voice in the democratic process does not count. Students had no control over the form of their ballot. They merely turned out to vote, faithful the democratic process they were told was in place would be upheld.

Also shocking Wednesday evening was the Senate's initial failure to add a motion to ratify the election to agenda for the evening, a move which showed that politicians in the room were not only hesitant to ratify the elections, but to even talk about ratification in a room with more than 100 constituents angry over the possibility of throwing out the election.

As a group that typically (and correctly) complains about a general sense of student apathy at UMass when it comes to campus politics, the actions of the SGA this week make no sense. Their failure to run an effective election stands contradictory to everything student government should stand for.

Student government now faces an even more uphill battle towards regaining legitimacy with the student body, particularly with an ALANA community that mobilized effectively behind Eduardo Bustamante only to see their victory stripped away.

The Collegian only hopes the next election in three weeks can be held fairly, by the rules and in a way befitting all governing bodies. We believe that we as students all deserved better than this.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

I do it for Ben & Jerry's

Leah Wyner

My stint with the Atkins diet began innocently enough.

I read the book in one sitting, and went to sleep with a smile of hope on my face and images of myself as the Sports Illustrated Swimsuit Issue cover girl dancing in my head. Just 20 carbs a day? I can do it. Right?

The severe limitations of my menu hit me the next day at breakfast when I sat down and realized I couldn't eat an apple. I settled for an omelet with two cubes of sharp cheddar cheese, and once my mouth started watering, and I had this sudden burst of hope that I could live without any fruit, and make it to the cover of Sports Illustrated.

But then my mom, on Atkins as well, dropped the bomb on me.

"What do you think you're doing with that ketchup? Ketchup has carbohydrates, Leah!" she exclaimed.

How I had managed to live this long without being aware of the dangers of ketchup I don't know, but regardless, I suffered through breakfast with the organic, sugar-free imitation ketchup.

For lunch I had a Greek salad, and after a grueling day lifeguarding in the sun, I referred back to Dr. Atkins' book. Page 45 stated, "Do some sort of exercise every day," but I read that as, "Continue your intense training for cross-country in the fall."

I barely finished half my workout, and dinner caused even more difficulty. My mom was annoyingly considerate, insisting that we not put my father and brother through the same Atkins-induced hell we were going through by cooking for only us. So there I sat, at a table covered in incredible food, most of which I could not eat: homemade mashed potatoes, biscuits, lasagna, salad, challah (Jewish bread) and chicken.

For about a week I stuck to basically that menu, occasionally including veggie burgers or protein shakes, and I managed to run every day, slowly. But then the forbidden food dreams started. One night I was swimming in a pool of rich chocolate mousse, the next I was at a birthday party for a giant and I had to eat my way through a 20-foot loaf of sourdough to get to the doorway.

Then there was the variation on the Skittles "Taste the Rainbow" campaign; instead of Skittles, it rained freshly squeezed orange juice. But they would always end as nightmares. The chocolate mousse would solidify and trap me, the bread would collapse in on me, and the orange juice rainstorm would eventually become a Nutra-Sweet blizzard.

Then one Monday I woke up craving ice cream so badly I was almost dizzy. My mom and I had a movie day, and 10 minutes into

For about a week I stuck to basicly that menu, occationally including veggie burgers or protein shakes, and i managed to run every day, slowly. But then the forbidden food dreams started.

"Terms of Endearment," the doorbell rang, and weak with hunger, I answered it to find my good friend Deb. I immediately noticed that Deb looked a little strange. She seemed to have a sort of halo surrounding her, and she was glowing like Patrick Swayze in the last scene of the movie "Ghost."

Then I saw the source of the angelic glow: Deb was holding a pint of Ben & Jerry's Phish Food ice cream. And then it was over. Instinct took control, and my mother and I inhaled the ice cream in less than ten minutes.

That marked the end of my expedition into the world of Dr. Atkins, and I can't say I mind. It's not a bad concept, and as many testimonials show, it does work. But it's not for the weak-minded; 20 grams of carbohydrates a day is a tiny amount (one slice of bread has 25).

And it doesn't mean just cutting out bread and pasta. There's no peanut butter, ketchup, salad dressing, or high-carbohydrate vegetables like carrots and peas. Got milk? Forget it. Diet Coke is out too, because it contains the artificial sweetener Aspartame, and cheese is okay only in small measured cubes. And if you're an athlete, think very carefully before trying Atkins. Those years of "carbo-loading" at team dinners weren't for nothing; carbohydrates are essential to athletic performance.

However, my advice is not to steer clear of the diet entirely. You and I both know that we all have that distant vision of ourselves on the cover of the swimsuit issue, and the Atkins craze is everywhere, from low-carb menus to low-carb chocolates and candy. If you're interested in the Atkins diet, by all means try it, but before you commit yourself, take a moment to realize what you're getting yourself into. Borrow the book, read it, and go into your kitchen and create a few Atkins-approved meals of your own, because the sample menus he provides are useless. The few of us who can actually sauté worth a damn will quickly become lazy and stick to omelets.

Give it a trial run.

As for me, many people would be angry with Deb for the ice cream episaode, but I'm thankful. Her generosity marked a turning point in my Atkins days, and my dieting days in general. Eating more protein and not eating late at night works well enough for me. In the end, Ben & Jerry's Phish Food ice cream is just not a sacrifice I'm willing to make.

Road safety must be readdressed

Jen Hodson

Road rage and reckless driving rece-ived much publicity within the last couple of months. These acts, which are found predominately among younger aged groups of people, have injured some but in most cases taken the lives of others.

After the Patriots won Super Bowl XXXVIII against the Carolina Panthers on Feb. 1, the city of Boston broke out in riot. A 21-year-old male college student from Northeastern was killed and three others injured, one critically, when a driver backed his sport utility vehicle into a group of revelers.

The driver fled the scene, but was quickly arrested afterward when spotted not to far away from where the accident had occurred. Stanley Filoma, 24, of Boston, was arraigned on charges including vehicular homicide, drunken driving and leaving the scene of an accident.

Just a week earlier, a tragic incident occurred in which a high-speed cat-and-mouse game that took place on Interstate 93 left 26-year-old Lynn Bader of Concord, N.H. dead. Her assailant, 24-year-old Jerone S. Jones, pulled out his loaded 40mm Glock semiautomatic pistol and fired, shooting her in the head.

A little less than a month ago, a University of Massachusetts student was also found lying in the middle of the road. Petrit Vasi, 22, of Dorchester was found by the Amherst Police Department at 12:20 a.m. at the intersection of Triangle and Mattoon Streets in Amherst. His injuries were consistent with being struck by or falling from a motor vehicle. At the time his condition was stated as critical but later was moved up to serious.

And just earlier this week, it was reported that another hit and run took place. This time in Roxbury, where two more Northeastern University students were injured, one left in critical condition. The driver of the blue or turquoise Mercury Tracer fled the scene by disappearing onto the Southeast Expressway. The two students suffered head and shoulder injuries and Boston Police have yet to track down the driver of the vehicle.

A University of Mass-achusetts environmental class, pesticides and public policy, briefly mentioned that studies have linked evidence supporting the theory that people are generally more afraid to fly than they are to drive. The idea of it seems like more of a risk. The truth of the matter is, is that the real danger lies in something you are faced with more commonly everyday.

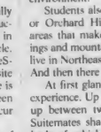
At an alarming rate, young people are a huge part of the problem of road accidents. It's old homework that distractions such as music, cell phones, and even alcohol are to blame, but quite possibly people's self awareness could be a factor too.

Automobile accidents are much more prevalent when it comes to injuries and deaths but many fail to realize it. In my opinion it is possible that this false perception of flying could be what's contributing to the number of automobile accidents that occur on the road.

It is also possible that young drivers just aren't as mentally equipped with the proper instructions and skills that are needed in order to operate a motor vehicle. According to DriveHomeSafe.com, a teen driving website center, statistics show that there is a high correlation between teenagers and accidents that occur on the road.

The Web site says 14 percent of all deaths due to motor vehicle accidents are teen drivers. "Most teen driver deaths due to motor vehicle accidents occur on weekends 53 percent of the time," the site states.

In addition, teen drivers killed in motor vehicle accidents have had a youth passenger in the automobile 45 percent of the time.



"Of teen drivers fatally injured in automobiles, more than one-third were speed related accidents," the site states. "More than any age group, teens are likely to be involved in a single vehicle crash. This age group makes up 7 percent of licensed drivers, but suffers 14 percent of fatalities and 20 percent of all reported accidents."

At an alarming rate, young people are a huge part of the problem of road accidents. It's old homework that distractions such as music, cell phones, and even alcohol are to blame, but quite possibly people's self awareness could be a factor too.

Although the reason has yet to be determined completely, one thing is for sure. Drivers are becoming more of a threat than what they once were perceived as. More importantly, the state should be taking steps in order to prevent this type of behavior from happening further. Anyone could be a next statistic, and its up to the community as a whole to try and prevent this from ever taking effect. The worst thing that could happen is for someone you know or care about to fall victim to such a pointless crime.

Sylvan not all it could be

Becky Martins

Dorm life can make or break a student's college experience.

As the time approaches to pick next year's housing assignments, University of Massachusetts students are forced to consider their residential options. The most popular of the on-campus housing areas is Southwest, which provides nearly 5,500 people with an urban atmosphere and social environment.

Students also have the choice of living in Central or Orchard Hill: both centrally located residential areas that make use of Amherst's natural surroundings and mountainous views. The option also exists to live in Northeast or even off-campus in an apartment. And then there is Sylvan: a separate entity in itself.

At first glance, suite-life may seem like a positive experience. Up to eight people can live together, split up between two singles and three double rooms. Suitemates share a common bathroom and lounge, both of which provide much-needed privacy. The dorms also offer fewer distractions than other residential halls due to their layout and quiet atmosphere. Essentially, the three dorms that make up Sylvan are made to resemble apartment-styled living, minus a personal kitchen, for a fraction of the cost. But from my experience living in Sylvan, I can verify this residential area does not come without major flaws.

As a freshman, I had big ideas about college when I arrived in the fall. I imagined living in a hall where everyone's doors were open and people were friendly. I expected to meet individuals like myself and establish great friendships. I figured my classes would be centrally located to my dorm and would not require long treks to get to them. Yet, upon moving onto campus, I proved myself dead wrong.

My first two weeks of college is one experience I hope to never experience again. Typically, freshmen are expected to be homesick as they adjust to university life. In time, they get used to their new living situation, meet people, and begin to enjoy themselves. But my case was different. On move-in day, I spent the first night in a room with only one closet, little floor and storage space, and with a roommate equally as miserable about our situation.

In Sylvan, there is an extreme lack of residential pride and solidarity... One reason for such a lack of spirit is the miniscule amount of events that occur there.

My suite was abandoned, since we were the only freshmen placed there, and upperclassmen were moving in the day after. Soon, it became a common occurrence for people to drive by my building and yell out comments, like "Suicide Sylvan." Instead of looking forward to what college entailed, I began counting down my days left.

Since first few weeks, my college experience has improved. I eventually befriended certain individuals in my suite, on my floor, and from different classes and activities. I got used to the walk to class from Sylvan and realized the convenience of buses. Somehow, my room became less cluttered and more livable. But despite these improvements, I have come to grips with Sylvan simply because I know no alternative.

I still feel like I have missed out on some parts of the college experience. Essentially, many of our friends are the people we live with. We get involved in activities sponsored by our living communities. We develop pride for the area where we reside. Yet, my freshmen year has lacked many of these things.

My point here is not to complain, but instead, to bring attention to a problem many students can relate with: the flaws that exist within UMass' housing assignment system. Such decisions should not be taken lightly. One bad residential experience may lead to someone transferring out of UMass. The caliber of the university's programs and majors would be overlooked for something as simple as a dorm: a poor impression to have of such an otherwise reputable school.

Students' age should be considered when being placed in residential areas. It may be bad enough getting our last choice in housing, but at least living with people who have similar circumstances makes the situation easier to deal with. Personally, I found my 'freshmen experience' considerably harder than most. I had to go out of my way to meet people and develop bonds with them, since I was disregarded by the university from the start. Having a few more freshmen around, me would have made the transition to college a little less trying than it was.

Another problem the university should look into is improving certain living community's atmospheres. In Sylvan, there is an extreme lack of residential pride and solidarity. But one reason for such a lack of spirit is the miniscule amount of events that occur there. Residents are barely given chances to meet and interact with each other, unless they take it upon themselves to do so. There is little involvement encouraged, and for that reason, people find themselves living more isolated lives. But if more events were carried out, focusing on uniting students, maybe impressions of residential areas like Sylvan would begin to change.

As the last fourth of the school year rolls around, I realize I will actually miss Sylvan. But this is because it is all I know. If it had not been for living with some great people, I would have moved out of Sylvan with the first opportunity that arose. Nothing else about this residential area impressed me, except for the few individuals who I met along the way. But Sylvan does not have to permanently be associated with such a negative impression. There are changes that could be made: changes that could alter the student body view of this residential area. If it were made into a more desirable place to live, complaints would be less in number. Fewer people would stop feeling 'stuck' in Sylvan and actually enjoy the experience. But until these changes occur, I can personally attest to the fact, as I have heard many times hollered from car windows, that 'Sylvan blows.'

'Sesame' Celebrates 35 Years

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Here's a kids show that still boasts plenty of street cred.

Now beginning its 35th season, "Sesame Street" remains a daily destination for millions of preschoolers, an evergreen cityscape as much a part of their world as any other play space.

It's been that way for generations of kids, as any of the show's estimated 74 million "grads" will recall from "Sesame Street Presents: The Street We Live On." This retrospective airs on most PBS stations 8 p.m. EST Sunday, then serves as the season opener the next day (check local listings).

Even if you haven't caught "Sesame Street" since around the time it premiered Nov. 10, 1969, you will be struck by how things seem much like you left them. The Muppets; the diverse community of humans; the letters and numbers that "sponsor" each hour.

Even parts of the 'hood are the same, notably the set for the brownstone apartment building at 123 Sesame St. (as it exists on Stage G at Kaufman Astoria Studios in Queens). Now nearly 35 years old, it should qualify for landmark status.

Clearly "Sesame Street" was designed for the ages by the "urban planners" at the upstart Children's Television Workshop (now renamed Sesame Workshop). But the era that gave rise to "Sesame Street" remains part of its culture.

A telling trace lives on in the theme song: "Sunny day, everything's A-OK." Popularized by pioneers of the U.S. space program, the term A-OK is as identified with the 1960s as granny glasses and tie-dye jeans.

So, perhaps, is the idealism surging in those years. Four months before "Sesame Street" premiered, that can-do spirit had helped put the first man on the moon. Likewise, it fueled dreams of helping put things right for the nation's kids.

" 'Sesame Street' grew out of the Great Society programs," says executive producer Lewis Bernstein, referring to the Johnson administration's social initiatives. "That was a period when politics, educational needs and the social milieu all converged to say, 'You influence kids at an early age and you can give them the skills they need to navigate their way through school and in life.'"

And, with the civil rights movement at full throttle, racial equality became another part of the show's message.

"When I first came here (in 1972) there were a lot of ex-hippies working here with a spirit of Let's Change the World. Maybe some of us have cut our hair," Bernstein says with a chuckle, "but the passion hasn't changed."

Early on, the "Sesame Street" brand of passion paved the way to many kids-show innovations: the racially integrated cast, the inner-city setting, the fast-paced, bite-sized structure of each episode.

"Sesame Street" gathered caring, flesh-and-blood adults to offer guidance and support for the childlike Muppets. It brought in celebrity guests to catch the eye of parents, who, after watching with their kids, then "naturally reinforce and extend the learning for the child," Bernstein says.

The game play has a pretty high learning curve. You won't be able to pick up any big blowout wins right off the bat without some assistance from the computer. To get a good idea of how to play the game, it would probably be best to try a few exhibition games first to get a feel for the controls. If you dive right into dynasty mode, you may find your team quickly falling to the bottom of the league standings. Learn to manage your team right by knowing when to talk to the pitchers on the mound, keeping your eye on the ball, and putting up runs on the board.

The pitching controls are not like the simple point, click, and pitch ones in other games. You need a steady hand and a quick finger to strike out batters. The pitch consists of holding down the button according to the pitch you want, aiming at an estimated location with the analog-stick, releasing the button at the desired velocity level, and tapping the button once more to gain control on the pitch. This set of controls is the most complicated to master, as your pitchers' velocity and control changes as they tire.

Hitting the ball has become much more realistic than other games, where you can crush plenty of homeruns in a single inning. Batting has more to do with timing and directing the batter to inside and outside pitches. You also have the option to check swing, and the umpires will even ask for assistance calls. Also, the overhead replays of your swings can help you try to get your timing down.

Finally, the fielding is not as much difficult as it is annoying. Instead of letting you get the ball with the closest player, the computer may option to choose someone who will obviously not get the ball. Then you must use the trigger buttons to try to change players before the ball is dropped. The quick fix is to choose the assisted fielding option. The computer will field the balls for you, but you will be in charge of directing the throw. This still has set backs as sometimes your players will avoid getting the out and choose to let it drop then let you throw it, with no real reasoning behind it.

When it comes to the realistic value that EA always manages to deliver, this game is as real as it gets. Players make amazing catches, drop balls, and slide to prevent double plays. Most of these are controllable by the player, but the computer adds the realism to it. Players will make all kinds of catches and react accordingly. When a player is hit by a pitch you can take your base or relive the Manny and Clemens incident.

Think it would be easy managing a single team in dynasty mode? Well, try being forced to manage three at once. That's right, you not only have to deal with managing a major league team, but the AAA and AA minor league teams as well. There you can develop talent that you can call up and send down accordingly. There are plenty of options to choose from when it comes to leading your favorite MLB team to the playoffs. You can choose to simulate, manage, or play all games as you try to improve the team's chemistry, which is their ability to work together, and your managing grade to tell you if you should get a raise or become the next Grady Little.

Another addition to the dynasty mode is the ability to try the fantasy draft which is much more difficult than the "Madden NFL" drafts. You will need to make some good planning as to who you will pick as the good players get swiped rather quickly. Also if you want to make the choices yourself, plan on spending a good two hours in front of the TV as it will take some thought when it comes to whom to choose next. On top of choosing your team's MLB roster, you must also pick players for your minor leagues. I recommend letting the computer doing the rest of the choosing for you. Another good thing to remember is that it is impossible to grab even half of a team's original roster, especially for the Red Sox and Yankees, as the players are picked rather quickly.

An added perk to becoming a better player is gaining points to unlock throwback jerseys, classic stadiums, and classic players. There's nothing really special about it but you get a chance to feel rewarded for your efforts and force your team to wear those ridiculous jerseys on throwback day.

The usual homerun race mode is there too, but there's also a pitchers duel mode and a scenario editor mode. The pitchers duel is literally that, except with baseballs and strike outs, not light sabers. The scenario mode is a very interesting new mode that lets you set up the moment you want to relive, or fix. Want to change history and send the Red Sox to the World Series instead of losing in extra innings? You can set up the inning, number of outs, who is up, the score, and so on. It's a nice added touch, especially when it gives Red Sox fans a chance to rewrite history, at least in the gaming world.

"MVP Baseball 2004" is a definite must-buy for gamers that are baseball fans. The game is more aimed to anyone who knows baseball than for just a gamer. While the level of difficulty giving it a lot of replay value for MLB fans, an average gamer would probably toss it aside. The graphics are far beyond the reaches of most MLB games, the rosters are pretty much up to date, and the overall feel to the game is excellent. It is definitely a better choice than "All-Star Baseball" as it remains close to the realism without getting the controls to difficult to manage. "MVP Baseball 2004" is currently available for all platforms and the PS2 version has an exclusive online multiplayer option.

UMass welcomes 'Othello'

By Ryan McGuigan
Collegian Correspondent

If you're looking for a powerful story of obsession, jealousy, and treachery, look no further than William Shakespeare's play, "The Tragedy of Othello."

Brought to University of Massachusetts by The Guthrie Theater, "Othello" will be presented in the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall for two showings tonight and tomorrow at 8 p.m.

Shakespeare is well known for revealing the weaknesses that drive men and women. In that regard, this play is described by the Fine Arts Center as a "riveting story of passion, manipulation, and betrayal, revealing a complex world in which social order, racial politics, and personal ambitions push the treacherous Iago to destroy Othello and his wife Desdemona," showing frailties and faults that still effect human emotion in this day and age.

Whether you are an avid theater attendee or looking for a great first-time experience, this could be performance for you. Lester Purry (Othello) and Cheyenne Casebier (Desdemona), the leading players in the production, believe this weekend's performances will be a powerful theatric experience.

Bill McCallum (right) and Lester Purry of the Guthrie Theater, based out of Minneapolis, Minn., will preform Shakespeare's "Othello" tonight and tomorrow in the FAC.

"Othello" is a powerful performance — perfect for a first time theater experience, and the Gutherie Theater production is performed from the heart, Casebier said.

The play is more realistic and intimate for modern audiences in this particular production because it is set in the late 1800's. Purry and Casebier both agreed that undertaking a production of Shakespeare requires detective work to fully understand the lines and emotions of the play.

"You need to understand the words for the audience to understand them," Casebier said.

The Guthrie Theater, based in Minneapolis, Minn. is making its first national tour in 20 years. Its artistic director, Joe Dowling, is internationally known for his work in Ireland and North America. The tour is part of the National Endowments For The Arts' "Shakespeare In American Communities" program, the largest Shakespeare tour ever presented in this nation's history.

The performances by the Guthrie Theater are cosponsored by the Office of the Chancellor, Office of the Provost, and the College of Humanities and Fine Arts at the University of Massachusetts; and through collaboration with the 5-College Theater Departments, 5-Colleges, Inc., UMass Department of Theater, and the students of Amherst College, Hampshire College, Mt. Holyoke College, Smith College, and the University of Massachusetts.

Tickets are available at $40, $30, and $15. Five College Students and anyone ages 17 and under will be admitted for $15. For tickets and information, call the FAC box office at 545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS, or go online to www.fineartscenter.com/center-series.

PBS special honors 35 years of 'Sesame'

A place with sunny days and everything A-OK, "Sesame Street" blended authenticity with aspiration: "Life doesn't exist in most places like it does on 'Sesame Street,'" Bernstein acknowledges. "But if we don't model it, it'll never exist."

Today, after 4,057 episodes, more than 8 million viewers tune in at least once a week. The show remains a top 10 weekday program among children aged 2 to 5, with its preschool audience up 9 percent in 2002-03 from the season before.

"Preschoolers' needs haven't changed," Bernstein says. "But the world has changed so much! So we've tried to take what's going on and stay a step ahead of it with the lessons we offer to kids."

Accordingly, the show stays steadfast while constantly adapting.

Two years ago, Maria and Luis, long the proprietors of a fix-it shop, made a career change, opening a Mail Boxes Etc.-type outlet. Smart move. People don't get things repaired the way they used to.

A more substantial change: "Elmo's World," the popular feature which, since 1998, has swept young viewers off Sesame Street and into a virtual realm, where, logged onto his PC, Elmo takes them on cyber-explorations.

But the more things change, and however more dangerously, the more "Sesame Street" remains a safe haven.

"MVP Baseball 2004" definitely delivers the quality expected from EA with almost up-to-date rosters, excellent game play options, extras, and a few different modes to try. With a roster adjusting option, you can send A-Rod up to make a withdrawal from Steinbrenner's piggy bank, and a create-a-player option allows you to keep the rosters as up-to-date as possible as the baseball season goes on. Hip-hop hits the Valley

By Monique Jemmott
Collegian Staff

The rain couldn't keep hip-hop from the student union ballroom Wednesday night.

"Hip-Hop: wo acts, one mic," brought to the University of Massachusetts by University Productions and Concerts, featured Def Jam recording artists Joe Buddens and Wu Tang Clan's Ghostface Killah.

The show opened up to a not yet packed audience with Mass State Property, a Boston rap group of three, including UMass student Ogho Oruma.

Their 20-minute performance, despite the lacking audience, was energetic and well executed. The entire performance was star worthy, but without the overextension of hip-hop stardom that can include a 50-member entourage crowding the stage and the unnecessary cursing tangents rappers often feel a need to take on. The songs they performed, despite their overall underground vibe, were still catchy enough to keep the crowd's attention.

Mass State Property was followed by an up-and-coming Def Jam R&B duo, the Paper Boys. Their sound had the rapper-singer vibe that is becoming increasingly popular in R&B, thanks to Mr. R. Kelly himself, but it did not do as good of a job keeping the interest of the crowd.

The following act, R&B group XL from Boston, was much more lively. The four members delivered an energetic show that made the girls go wild, gave R&B lovers something to look forward to, and even had the hardcore hip-hop lovers bob their heads to the melodic beats. The group of teenagers got an A+ for its performance and extra credit for giving street credibility to R&B boy bands, even with calculated dance moves.

Ghostface Killah, Joe Budden, XL, Mass State Committee
Student Union Ballroom

March 31

Boston/Connecticut DJ Clinton Sparks kept the crowd entertained throughout the night with the hottest hip-hop and R&B, as well as reggae classics and party favorites.

At about 10:45, the first of the two headliners, Joe Budden, took the stage to screams from an anxious crowd as he performed his current single, "Focused." He then went right into his previous single "Jersey home", but the entire scene on the stage was all too generic.

Budden soon lost the crowd with his lazy stage presence, with the beats he performed over the only thing keeping the show going. Instead of the beats to his own songs Budden used current popular ones such as Usher's "Yeah" and Young Guns "Cant stop, wont stop." The show dragged on, with desperate attempts to keep the crowd engaged, like putting one side against the other in a war of "F that side."

The crowd finally began to pay more attention when he performed his smash "Pump it Up" but soon afterwards, boredom ensued. Budden's set ended with the type of ubiquitous a capella freestyle that should be reserved for rappers who are capable of doing it justice, followed by his upcoming single "Your body's hot." Overall, Budden's performance was mediocre at best.

Enter Ghostface Killah ...

From the time the "Iron man" entered the stage, the entire demeanor shifted, and it was obvious whom the viewers really came to see. Kappa Donna, one of the lesser-known Wu Tang clan members, started off the set, and the crowd came to life with the hypnotic beats of the Rza.

Ghostface entered the stage cool as a cucumber, and began with cuts from his last album "Iron man." He also performed many songs from all the Wu Tang efforts taking the crowd for a trip through the early 1990s. When he performed "Ice Cream" from Raekwon's album, the crowd went wild.

Wu-Tang beats were used for the entire show, and although the entourage was present, it was actually an asset rather than the downfall of the performance. All the while the audience stayed energized. When "Chez La Ghost" was performed, there was no discrimination, and women of all colors and creeds were invited on the stage to "shake their thangs."

The performance came full circle with the heart wrenching "All I got is you," after which Ghost did his duty as the responsible entertainer, dropping knowledge on the crowd with "Take care of your kids" and "Be a man." He performed his current single from his upcoming album "Pretty Tony," and the show ended on a high note thanks to Mr. Face.

And this time when the freestyle was done, it was flawless.

Florida Marlins manager Jack McKeon poses with the team's 2003 World Championship trophy on March 23 at the team's spring training facility in Jupiter, Fla. McKeon came out of retirement at the age of 72 and became the oldest manager to win a World Series.

McKeon's Fish tale

By Steven Wine
Associated Press

JUPITER, Fla. (AP) — Batting practice is already under way when Jack McKeon walks onto the field carrying a bat, wearing a jaunty grin and looking for a conversation. He began his baseball career as a minor-league catcher in 1949, which means he has 55 years of stories to tell.

There's the one about how he once fell through a trap door behind home plate chasing a foul ball in Missoula, Mont. And how he wore a Beatles wig in the dugout during a game in 1964 while managing the Atlanta Crackers. And how he and several minor-league teammates hitchhiked for transportation one season and enjoyed fooling drivers by posing as soil experts, ship repairmen or religious missionaries.

"In this game," McKeon says, "you've got to have fun."

Another of his favorite stories is about the hard-of-hearing grandfather who came out of retirement last year at age 72 and became the oldest manager to win a World Series, leading the Florida Marlins past Barry Bonds, Sammy Sosa and Derek Jeter during an enchanting postseason run.

That one may be hard to believe, but it really happened. As confirmation, during the offseason McKeon received a papal blessing, congratulations from the president at the White House, the NL Manager of the Year award and other tributes.

"If anybody needs any keys to the city, let me know," McKeon says.

The Marlins' achievement makes a good story, but McKeon is ready for the next chapter. He's back for a full season, his first since 2000, and optimistic his team can contend again.

Few pick Florida to repeat as World Series champs, and the only National League team to do so since 1922 was Cincinnati in 1975-76. McKeon dismisses the pundits with a wave of his stogie.

"What's to pick?" he says. "I watch 'The Bachelor' and 'The Bachelorette' and pick the winner, and they always get knocked out. It's just a guessing game."

The Marlins boast one of the best rotations in baseball, including World Series MVP Josh Beckett, NL Rookie of the Year Dontrelle Willis and eventually perhaps even A.J. Burnett, who led the major leagues with five shutouts in 2002 and hopes to return from elbow surgery by the All-Star break. Right fielder Miguel Cabrera appears destined for stardom, and the lineup also includes All-Star infielders Mike Lowell and Luis Castillo.

Still, last season was widely considered a fluke, and Florida ranks behind Philadelphia and Atlanta in the NL East in most preseason prognostications. Why?

"It's connected with this franchise," left fielder Jeff Conine says. "We play in a crummy stadium. It's hotter than heck and it rains all the time, and all you hear are bad things about the Marlins. People say, 'They need a retractable roof and they should be contracted.' There's nothing positive. Everything is negative. I think that carries over to the team."

Which is where McKeon comes in. He was rescued from retirement last May, when he took over a club that was 16-22 and accustomed to losing.

He had admired the Marlins' core of young talent even back in 2000 when he was with Cincinnati. And he noticed the negativity.

"I sat in the dugout managing against these guys and said, 'Wouldn't we like to have that club over there?'" he says. "I saw the potential, but it was almost like being in neutral, and you had to do something to get them going."

McKeon encouraged a stronger work ethic but also kept players loose with his Stengel-like idiosyncrasies, such as a tendency to mangle names. The Marlins won with pitching, defense, speed and the merriest clubhouse in baseball.

intense," Cannella said. Even if we had the automatic qualifier, it's developed into a strong rivalry over the years."

Last year, the unranked Nittany Lions upset the No. 6 Minutemen with a late goal in the fourth quarter at Garber Field. Will Jones scored his third goal of the day to lift PSU past UMass, putting a pockmark on the Minutemen's otherwise shimmering 13-3 record. The game saw eight lead changes, and neither team ever led by more than one goal.

While Cannella downplayed any feelings of revenge during his weekly radio show Tuesday, he recognized that last year's loss will be fresh in the minds of the players involved tomorrow.

"Of course they want it back. Penn State took one from us on our home field. We'd obviously like to go down there and do the same thing. That game really turned the season around for them," Cannella said. Prior to the game, the Nittany Lions were 1-5, and entered Amherst as the clear underdog.

"I think we like the idea of being able to go in as the underdog this year," Cannella said.

The Minutemen are rolling off one of their best performances of the year — Sunday's 6-3 win over Hofstra. While strong defense and stellar goaltending from Bill Schell allowed the offense to play more of a possession game, Cannella expects that six goals probably won't do the job tomorrow.

"I don't think so. I told the offense that we can't expect the defense to hold teams down like that," he said. "We just have to keep plugging away on the offensive end."

Notes: Schell and freshman Matt Tundo earned ECAC player awards this week. Schell, the junior goaltender from Mahopac, N.Y. was named defensive player of the week for his 13-save effort against Hofstra. Tundo was given the Rookie of the Week nod after scoring four goals in games against Sacred Heart and the Pride ... Senior attackman Jeff Zywicki will not play Saturday, still nursing an injury that has kept him out of all but one game this season.

George Washington softball done for year due to injuries

Colonials retreat

Often a player may have to play through a game while hurt, but rarely has a season ever been cancelled over injuries.

Such is the case with George Washington University, whose athletic department officials found it necessary to hang up the remainder of its softball season. The decision arose after conceding that the team doesn't have enough healthy players in certain positions to securely complete its spring season.

Before the cancellation of the rest of the 2004 season, there were only 13 active members on the Colonials' roster. The lineup included just three pitchers, one shortstop, one second baseman, no third basemen, and two catchers. Many of the members on the roster were forced to learn several different positions in light of the recent injuries.

"The decision to cancel the softball season, however, was made solely on the basis of the health and well-being of team members and usual competitive requirements, not because of the University's investigation into recent allegations," stated the GWU Web site.

No University officials could be reached for comment on the nature of the allegations.

'Franke'-ly the best

After dropping to a lowly .218 average last week, Massachusetts centerfielder Aisha Franke has rebounded very quickly. Her climb back into the spotlight was highlighted earlier this week when she was named Atlantic 10 Player of the Week.

This award comes after a week-end in which she went six-for-nine while hitting .867 with two runs scored, an RBI and a stolen base for the Minutewomen in a perfect 3-0 campaign. In the victory at home against Vermont on March 26, Franke went two for three with a run scored, an RBI and a stolen base as the Maroon and White secured the nation's longest home winning streak at 59 games. In the doubleheader sweep of LaSalle on March 27, she went four for six and scored a run.

Franke is currently batting a respectable .281, good enough for fourth on the team, scoring 11 runs with two RBI, and is a perfect four for four in stolen base attempts.

"Aisha's been slowing things down," coach Elaine Sortino said. "She's began to focus a lot better, and it's paying off."

Flying high

University of Dayton hurler Melissa Mather was named A-10 Pitcher of the Week earlier this week, her first such award in 2004.

Over the past week, the sophomore has posted a 3-1 record with a .056 ERA to lead the Flyers, highlighted by back-to-back shutouts that include a two-hitter.

Mather pitched 32 of the Flyers' 45 innings last week, leading them to wins over Eastern Kentucky, Morehead State and St. Bonaventure. Against EKU, she allowed just four hits en route to her first shutout of the week. Her second came against Morehead State, where she had a no-hitter going into the fifth inning before surrendering two hits to the Eagles but preserving the shutout.

Against the Bonnies, she pitched all 18 innings of a doubleheader in which she allowed just three hits, two earned runs and struck out a season-high ten batters en route to the two-game sweep.

advantage in that category the Minutewomen. The Dukes have seven players with at least 10 points this season.

UMass has seven players who have scored any kind of point this season.

The Minutewomen can't afford another sloppy start the way they did against UConn. Duquesne has scored 62 of their 110 goals in the first half this season, and 58-percent of their shots in regulation have come in the first half.

Bolduc has confidence in her team's ability even though it has had a rough start.

"We were playing much tougher competition. They have the momentum because they have more wins. The girls are ready to turn over a new leaf, and put everything behind them," she said. "We could win our conference. We could win the NCAA. We are that good."

Minutemen face PSU

UMass changes season's course

By ANDREW MERRITT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Call it a cliché, but Massachusetts men's lacrosse coach Greg Cannella likes to think of the final six games of the season as a brand new slate.

The Minutemen travel to State College, Pa. tomorrow to face Penn State, and they bring a 4-4 record with them. After two strong wins over Sacred Heart and Hofstra, the Minutemen sit at .500 for the season, and want to focus on their stretch run.

"It means we fought back hard to get to .500," Cannella said of the team's mentality. "It's a new season, we're essentially 0-0, so now it's a six-game season. It's kind of about looking forward, and not back. We just have to focus on where we are now, and stick to the game plan."

After a rough start that saw them drop all the way to 2-4 before the convincing victories in their last two games, the Minutemen are certainly still in it, and have a chance to prove it tomorrow when they play their first ECAC opponent of the season.

The Nittany Lions (3-3) will be no easy match, though, and could benefit from a drastic change in playing surface for UMass. The Minutemen haven't played a game on grass since their 10-5 loss to Brown on Harvard's Jordan Field on March 20. Penn State's Jeffrey Field has a grass surface, and after days of rain this week and a 30 percent chance of precipitation tomorrow, things could get messy.

"I think we'll be ready to play," Cannella said. "It will be good to get away and play a game. We can't worry about the weather or where we play. If we relied on good conditions all the time, we'd never have them."

Penn State comes off an 11-10 upset of Denver on Sunday, led by a five-goal game from junior attackman Will Cutler, who also scored the game-winner, and earned ECAC player of the week honors last week for his efforts. Sophomore Nate Whitaker extended his streak of consecutive games with a goal to 20, and goaltender Mike Stoltz made 15 saves. Stoltz currently ranks second in the ECAC with a .569 save percentage.

The matchups between Penn State and UMass have been particularly scintillating. Three of the four all-time meetings — an even split — have been decided by one goal, and last year's 11-10 Penn State victory was one of the more thrilling finishes of the 2003 season.

"You know that both teams are going to be

The Massachusetts women's rowing team is set to open its season this weekend with a pair of races and looks to build off the success it had last year.

On Saturday, UMass will take on the University of New Hampshire and the University of Rhode Island in the Yankee Cup at Lake Quinsigamond in Worcester at noon.

The race was scheduled to take place last Saturday at the Campanella Rowing Center in Rhode Island, but high winds forced it to be postponed. On Sunday, UMass travels to Pelham, N.Y. to compete against Columbia and Holy Cross.

Coach Jim Dietz said the race on Saturday will be particularly important. Dietz said the relocation of the race to Worcester should be beneficial to his team. Getting a race under their belts on this course should help the team because Lake Quinsigamond is the site of this year's ECAC Metro Cup.

Dietz feels that his team is the favorite to capture their ninth consecutive Atlantic 10 championship this year, but said that UNH should be one of the stronger teams in the league and it will be a good opportunity for the team to see such competition in their first race.

Expectations are very high this season as the team is setting its sights on making the NCAA championships for the first time in three years. However, they are not looking past the fact that they need to win the A-10 championship. Dietz understands the A-10 is getting stronger and the UMass women must continue to work hard. While UMass is considered a national contender this year, Dietz feels it is important to the team and the school to win the A-10 title.

UMass is looking to build off some of the success it has enjoyed since the season ended. The team competed in the esteemed Henley Women's Regatta in England last June and took home a gold medal on the final day of competition.

In the fall, UMass participated in the annual Head of the Charles race. The Minutewomen recorded their best finish ever in the event, capturing 19th place in the Open Division.

The team lost eight members from last year's team to graduation, but this year's squad should be able to fill those gaps. There is a great amount of experience on this year's team, as 60 rowers will return from last year.

Dietz said there was a high level of competition on the team to make the first varsity eight-boat.

"The team has been working at a very high level and is coming along nicely," Dietz said.

Dietz mentioned that the rain forecasted for this weekend should have no effect on the races. He predicted that Saturday's race would be a downwind race, one that will give UMass an advantage because the team is physically strong.

Hard times hit Minutewomen

By JEFF HOWE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Games aren't won and lost on paper, and the same thing can be said about a team's season. The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (1-6) dropped a frustrating sixth game in a row Wednesday afternoon at Connecticut (3-5) by a score of 19-13 after coming out of the gates flat.

UConn junior Tammy Michel scored her third goal of the game to give the Huskies a 5-0 advantage just 7:22 into the contest. Minutewomen goalie Lauren McCarthy was pulled from the cage nearly six minutes later after giving up her ninth goal of the game on just 10 shots, and UConn was ahead 9-2.

UMass head coach Carrie Bolduc said her squad just wasn't prepared for what UConn's attack was throwing at them.

"Their attacking unit set up some things our defense wasn't ready for. UConn has a very smart attack this year, and they took advantage of our mistakes," Bolduc said.

UMass was able to rally before the end of the first half, and closed the deficit to 11-6 on Kerri Connerty's second of four goals in the game.

Neither team established much momentum in the second half as they exchanged goals through the first 20 minutes. UMass was able to cut the lead down to 14-10 with 10 minutes to play on Tracey Drown's third of four goals in the contest, but UConn finished the way they started with a flurry of quick goals.

Bolduc said this trend has been an ongoing problem.

"The first five minutes and the last five minutes have killed us," she said.

This was also the first game the Minutewomen have lost by more than three goals. "We had more lapses than we've had in past games," Bolduc said.

Four of their six losses this season have come by a total of five goals. Two of their losses have come to top ten teams in Syracuse and Boston University.

"It is an unfortunate thing if [people] just look at our record. We're a fairly strong team. We're just not coming up with wins. The girls know they are a good team. We just didn't capitalize on momentum when we had it," Bolduc said.

They will have the opportunity to turn things around on Sunday at Garber Field when they host Atlantic 10 foe Duquesne at noon. The Dukes have been hot of late, winning six in a row with their star player, Ginger Flocco, winning the Inside Lacrosse Player of the Week Honorable Mention for the second consecutive week.

Flocco leads Duquesne in goals (33) and points (46), and she is tied for the team lead in assists (13). Containing Flocco will be UMass' main objective in order to win this game.

"Ginger Flocco is similar to Jess Burnap [UNH's main scoring threat], and we had Kristin St. Hilaire defend her. [Hilaire] shut her down to one goal. We think we can limit their attacking players," said Bolduc.

Duquesne has a much bigger

Baseball looks for some vengence at Richmond

By BOB MCGOVERN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Coach Mike Stone and the Massachusetts baseball team (7-7, 1-2 A-10) have been waiting for this for a long time.

It was last year on May 24 when Richmond ended the Minutemen's season. The Spiders (14-10, 3-0 A-10) defeated UMass 7-4, winning the Atlantic 10 championship and leaving a bitter taste in the mouths of Stone and his squad.

The two teams face off this weekend in Amherst with a double-header on Saturday starting at 12 p.m. and a single game on Sunday afternoon slated to start at 2:30 p.m.

"This started last year when we were beaten in the championship series against Richmond. We realized that we need to be a better team in order to compete for the league championships and we made some adjustments to do it," Stone said. "We asked our players to be more committed and more dedicated and to raise their level of play and it's going to need to happen this weekend especially."

Richmond hasn't been playing its best baseball recently, losing seven of its last 10 games. The three wins came from a sweep of A-10 rival St. Joseph's last weekend that put the Spiders in first place in the A-10 West Division.

In its most recent game, Richmond dropped an 8-5 decision to Radford showing that last year's A-10 juggernaut is indeed vulnerable.

Stone is not concerned with the Spider's recent downfalls and hopes the Minutemen can rebound after mixed results over the past few weeks.

"They're a good team regardless of what their record is and we're going to have to be ready to play our best," Stone said, "if the other team is struggling that does help a little bit, but I don't think we've played as well as we can the last week and a half."

UMass is coming off a decisive 9-2 victory over Sacred Heart. The score, however, doesn't tell the story. The Minutemen were up 3-2 until they had a five run eight innings. Stone was pleased to get his team on the right page, but only for the experience factor.

"I think people needed to get to pitch, score some runs, and get in to flow of playing well again and get in the rhythm that we are accustomed to doing. So from that point of view I think that was important," Stone said.

There will be no room for error against Richmond as it possesses one of the strongest rotations in the A-10, with a powerful lineup to back it up.

Leading the rotation for the Spiders is the trio of, Jason Bolinski, Matt McLoughin, and Derek Duclos. The only member of the rotation that UMass saw last year was McLoughin, who pitched four scoreless innings in the deciding game of the A-10 championship.

The only weakness in the Richmond rotation is their number four starter, Thomas Martin, who has been beaten up this year with a 5.40 ERA. Even with the highest ERA in the starting rotation, Martin has received some of the Spider's best run support and is 3-1 on the season.

Stone is looking to come out of the gates quickly against Richmond so that the Minutemen can exploit some of the weaker cogs in its bullpen.

"Its always nice to get into somebody's bullpen and if we can get into their bullpen pretty quick then that gives us an advantage," Stone said.

Pacing the Spider's offense has been shortstop Bobby LeNoir, who was moved to the top of the order at the beginning of the season. LeNoir is batting .337 and leads the team in hits (31), runs (26), and doubles (9).

"We saw those guys a lot last year, they are a good southern team. I don't think they are as strong as they were last year, but I don't like to get wrapped up in individual players," Stone said, "we pitch to people based off of what we've seen in the past and the scouting report."

UMass will be missing second basemen Cullan Maumus after he sustained a serious injury in the Minutemen's game against George Washington on March 28th. Maumus was hit by a pitch on his forearm and will be out for four to six weeks barring surgery.

Stone will be running freshman Anthony Santos at second and will have senior Adam Stojanowski running third base. There will be some offense lost in the transition, but Stone is confident in the depth of his roster.

"Late in the ballgame we have a couple of moves we can make but we would have to move a lot of people out of position," Stone said, "sometimes in order to get a bat in there late we're going to need to do that."

Stone doesn't want his team to be intimidated by the perennial A-10 powerhouse; he is looking for his team to simply keep playing their game.

"I don't think Richmond is the same team they were last year, but they're a good team," Stone said, "I think a lot of people when they play Richmond they play the name and not the game. I think they can be had."

Rice to be questioned on events of 9-11

By WILLIAM C. MANN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) — The commission looking into the Sept. 11 attacks will ask Condoleezza Rice why governmental bureaucracy became so flawed as to allow the terrorist strike and how the Bush administration plans to fix the problems, panel members said Sunday.

"Nineteen men with $350,000 defeated every single defensive mechanism we had up on the 11th of September, 2001, and they defeated it utterly," former Democratic Sen. Bob Kerrey of Nebraska.

President Bush's national security adviser, in her public testimony Thursday, will need to answer how that happened, Kerrey said.

Rice also will be asked about ways to correct "what has gone wrong so badly," said a Republican commissioner, former Navy Secretary John Lehman.

"She's now got her mind focused on just what went wrong, and I want to hear her views on some of the things that we're going to do and be recommending to make fundamental changes," Lehman said. He appeared with Kerrey on CBS' "Face the Nation."

Recommendations of the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States are due July 26. The commission's deadline was extended from May 27 after complaints about alleged lack of cooperation by the White House.

A major complaint was Bush's refusal to let Rice testify publicly and under oath, which he said would violate a president's right to confidential exchanges with his advisers.

Under pressure from Congress and the commission, including the chairman, former GOP Gov. Thomas H. Kean of New Jersey, Bush relented last week.

Bush also agreed to testify, alongside Vice President Dick Cheney, but the session will be private, unsworn and unrecorded.

Violent demonstrations rage in Iraq

American military deaths now top 600

By KHALID MOHAMMED
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NAJAF, Iraq (AP) — Supporters of an anti-U.S. Shiite Muslim cleric waged violent demonstrations in four Iraqi cities Sunday, punctuated by a gun battle at the Spanish garrison near this Shiite holy city that killed at least 20 people, including two coalition soldiers — an American and a Salvadoran.

The U.S. military on Sunday reported two Marines were killed in a separate "enemy action" in Anbar province, raising the toll of American service members killed in Iraq to more than 600.

Protesters also clashed with Italian and British forces in other cities in a broad, violent challenge to the U.S.-led coalition, raising questions about its ability to stabilize Iraq ahead of a scheduled June 30 handover of power to Iraqis.

With less than three months left before then, the U.S. occupation administrator appointed an Iraqi defense minister and chief of national intelligence.

"These organizations will give Iraqis the means to defend their country against terrorists and insurgents," L. Paul Bremer said at a press conference.

About three miles outside Najaf, supporters of anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr opened fire on the Spanish garrison during a street protest that drew about 5,000 people. The protesters were angry over the arrest of the cleric's aide, said the Spanish Defense Ministry in Madrid.

The attackers opened fire at about noon, said Cmdr. Carlos Herradon, a spokesman for the Spanish headquarters in nearby Diwaniyah.

The Spanish and Salvadoran soldiers inside the garrison fired back, and assailants later regrouped in three clusters outside the base as the shooting continued for several hours.

Two soldiers — a Salvadoran and an American — died and nine other soldiers were wounded, the Spanish defense ministry said. No other details were available.

More than 200 people were wounded, said Falah Mohammed, director of the Najaf health department. El Salvador's defense minister said several Salvadoran soldiers were wounded.

The death toll of at least 20 included two Iraqi soldiers who were inside the Spanish base, witnesses said.

Spain has 1,300 troops stationed in Iraq, and the Central American contingent is of a similar size. The Salvadorans are under Spanish command as part of an international brigade that includes troops from Central America.

Multiple train bombings in Madrid last month that killed 191 people have been blamed on al-Qaida-linked terrorists, who said they were punishing Spain for its alliance with the United States in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Spain's new government, elected just days after the March 11 train bombings, has promised to make good on its pre-election promise to withdraw all Spanish troops from Iraq unless command for peacekeeping is turned over to the United Nations.

In El Salvador, the defense minister said the attack will not alter his country's role in reconstruction efforts.

"It reinforces even more our decision to continue helping a country that is suffering," Juan Antonio Martinez said Sunday.

The Najaf protesters were upset over the detention of Mustafa al-Yacoubi, a senior aide to the 30-year-old al-Sadr, who opposes the U.S.-led occupation of Iraq. Al-Sadr is at odds with most Shiites, who hope to gain substantial power in the new Iraqi government.

Shiites comprise about 60 percent of Iraq's 25 million people but were brutally repressed by the regime of Saddam Hussein, a Sunni Muslim.

At coalition headquarters in Baghdad, a senior official said on condition of anonymity that al-Yacoubi was detained Saturday on charges of murdering Abdel-Majid al-Khoei, a senior Shiite cleric who returned to Iraq after the U.S.-led invasion. A total of 25 arrest warrants were issued,

Democratic convention struggles with Boston limits

By JENNIFER PETER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) – City leaders lured the Democrats with lobsters, Red Sox games, and the promise of millions in corporate contributions.

They wooed relentlessly, giving party officials complimentary cell phones and then peppering them with text messages about Boston's historic wonders as they toured other cities competing for the honor of hosting the 2004 national convention.

But during the 15 months since Boston won its first-ever presidential convention, the enthusiasm so marveled at by party leaders has begun to dissolve into a logistical and political quagmire.

The event's cramped quarters in a densely packed downtown, combined with the heightened security surrounding the first national political convention since the Sept. 11 attacks, prompted the Secret Service to call for the closure of two of the city's main transportation centers during the course of the four-day gathering.

Republican Gov. Mitt Romney started a political firestorm last month when he suggested that the long-planned convention be moved from the centrally located FleetCenter to South Boston — a piece of unsolicited advice that Democrats interpreted as a partisan effort to torpedo their big party.

The police unions, engaged in an ugly contract dispute with Boston Mayor Tom Menino, are threatening to picket. A key piece of land near the FleetCenter may not be available for use, as once promised. And fund-raising, which looked so rosy at the beginning, remains an open question, especially with Romney balking at contributing any state money.

Little did city Democrats know at the time it pushed so hard for the convention that it also would be giving the convention something else: the nominee, Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry. That turns the pressure up a notch to make sure things go smoothly.

"There's always a problem here or there in every convention city, but not this serious and not in a situation where you have a hometown boy being nominated," said University of Virginia political science professor Larry Sabato, an expert in presidential politics. "In some ways, Boston literally wasn't built for a convention this massive and with this much media scrutiny."

The same attributes to make Boston so appealing to convention organizers — its small-town feel, Colonial charm, pedestrian-friendly layout, and centrally located arena — have become double-edged swords.

The narrow, one-way, streets (many of them cobblestone and meandering, just like they were when the nation was born) will be difficult for the delegate

Suicide apartment blast kills Madrid train terrorism suspects

MADRID, Spain (AP) — The suicide apartment house blast that killed the alleged ringleader of last month's Madrid train bombings and four other terror suspects left the core of the terror group either dead or in jail, Spain's interior minister said on Sunday.

Explosives discovered in the building where the five killed themselves to avoid capture Saturday night indicated they were plotting more violence and were linked to the failed bombing of a high-speed rail line Friday.

Two or three suspects may have escaped before the blast, which also killed a special forces officer and wounded 15 other policeman, Interior Minister Angel Acebes told a news conference.

Preliminary forensic tests on human remains in and around the apartment showed that five suspects had died in the blast, one more than previously reported, an Interior Ministry official said Sunday.

Sarhane Ben Abdelmajid Fakhet, a 35-year-old Tunisian accused of spearheading the March 11 attacks that killed 191 people, was among those who died in the explosion in Leganes south of Madrid, Acebes said.

"The core of the group that carried out the attacks is either arrested or dead in yesterday's collective suicide, including the head of the operative commando unit," Acebes said.

Fifteen suspects are already in custody in the Madrid attacks. Six have been charged with mass murder and nine with collaborating with or belonging to a terrorist organization. Eleven of the 15 charged are Moroccan.

The 22 pounds of dynamite and 200 detonators found in the apartment are the same as that used in the March 11 attacks and in the bomb that was discovered Friday before it could explode along the high-speed rail line between Madrid and Seville, Acebes said.

"They were going to keep on attacking because some of the explosives were prepared, packed and connected to detonators," he said.

The type of explosives and detonators found are widely available in Spain, and the match was not certain proof of a connection.

The judge overseeing the probe of the attacks issued international warrants for Fakhet and five others last week. Fakhet's was described as "leader and coordinator" of the suspects in the March 11 bombings. It said he had been an active campaigner for jihad, or holy war, among the suspects as early as mid-2003. He had shown signs of preparing a violent act in the Madrid area "as a demonstration of said jihad," the warrant said.

Another man on the warrant list, Abdennabi Kounjaa, a Moroccan, also was identified as among the four who died Saturday night. A third man — Asri Rifaat Anouar — was not on the list. Another suspect's body was too severely mutilated to identify immediately, Acebes said.

The Interior Ministry official said that police evidence indicated that Jamal Ahmidan — who was also on the warrant list — was among the dead, but forensic tests were pending.

Boston drivers get Big Dig headache

By MARK PRATT
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON (AP) — The new Interstate 93 southbound tunnel shrank from three to two lanes on Sunday, a change that caused some confusion and minor traffic backups but was likely to turn into a major headache for commuters Monday, Big Dig officials said.

"This is the most challenging shift of traffic the project has ever done," Turnpike Authority Chairman Matthew J. Amorello said.

The highway was reduced Sunday morning from three southbound lanes to two before the Dewey Square Tunnel, commonly known as the South Station tunnel. The two right lanes will remain underground, while the left hand lane at Exit 22 now diverts drivers onto a surface street, which eventually rejoins I-93. Traffic lights along the surface stretch have been reset for minimum delays. The project is expected to take 10 months.

Many drivers on Sunday apparently found the change confusing, making dangerous last-minute shifts from the left lane to remain in the underground lanes. Amorello said there was no reason to take such risks.

"If you're in the left, you can still get to I-93 from the surface road," Amorello said.

Officials expect less late lane shifts as drivers get used to the new configuration.

"Hopefully by the end of the week, this will be ho-hum," said Charles Sterling, the project's traffic engineer.

and 13 suspects have been arrested, the official said.

Spanish-led forces said they did not participate in the arrest.

In Baghdad, al-Sadr supporters took over several police stations in Sadr City, a slum stronghold of the cleric, and television pictures showed gunmen driving through the area in stolen police cars.

Witnesses said U.S. forces moved into the poor neighborhood and fired to disperse the crowed. Helicopter gunships flew overhead. The U.S. military had no immediate comment.

In central Baghdad's Firdaus Square, police fired warning shots during a protest by hundreds of al-Sadr supporters against al-Yacoubi's arrest. At least two protesters were injured, witnesses said.

In Kufa, near Najaf, al-Sadr supporters took over a police station and seized guns inside. No police were in sight.

In the southern city of Nasiriyah, Italian troops traded fire with militiamen demonstrating against al-Yacoubi's detention, said Lt. Col. Pierluigi Monteduro, chief of staff of Italian troops in the region. One Italian officer was wounded in the leg.

Also in the south, British troops clashed with protesters in Amarah, according to the Ministry of Defense in London. It was unclear whether there were casualties.

Al-Sadr's office in Baghdad issued a statement later Sunday calling off street protests and saying the cleric would stage a sit-in at a mosque in Kufa, where he has delivered fiery weekly sermons for months.

Al-Sadr supporters also were angered by the March 28 closure of his weekly newspaper by U.S. officials. The Americans alleged the newspaper was inciting violence against coalition troops.

The two U.S. Marines, both assigned to the 1st Marine Division, were killed by an "enemy action" in Anbar province Saturday, the military said. One died Saturday and the other Sunday, the statement said without providing details.

The dual Bush-Cheney testimony, Kean said Sunday, was part of a deal with the White House.

"All things considered, maybe we would have rather to have them one at a time, but we don't see any problem with it, really," Kean said on NBC's "Meet the Press."

"They promised us to give us the time we needed to get our questions answered, and if we have any problems, ... we'll have follow-ups."

Kean said a date has been set for their appearance, but he would not disclose it. After Rice's appearance, the next scheduled public hearings are April 13-14 that will focus on failures in intelligence and law enforcement.

Scheduled witnesses include Attorney General John Ashcroft; former Attorney General Janet Reno; CIA Director George Tenet; FBI Director Robert Mueller; and former FBI Director Louis Freeh.

The final report should be published before the November elections, possibly as early as July, even though the White House must review it first for intelligence problems, Kean said. It will contain surprises, he said.

"I've been surprised by some of what we've found, and so, I think, (the public) will, yes," Kean said.

"We've got some very serious recommendations to make, and I think they'll be something of great value to the American people and also hopefully will make the country safer," he said.

Youth gather for Palm Sunday

Pope John Paul II, clutching a braided palm, gives his blessing to thousands of young people in a Palm Sunday service in St. Peter's Square.

By FRANCES D'EMILIO

VATICAN CITY (AP) — Pope John Paul II celebrated Palm Sunday Mass in the company of thousands of young people who joyously waved fronds and olive branches and cheered encouragement as he began a heavy schedule of Holy Week ceremonies.

The Vatican described the gathering of more than 40,000 faithful in front of the altar on the steps of St. Peter's Basilica as an "antidote" to the fears of terrorism and war around the globe.

Security has been heightened in the last few months at the Vatican over concerns that the heart of Roman Catholicism could be target of Islamic extremists. Italian police officers patrolled the crowd, and Vatican plainclothes security personnel kept a close eye on participants.

Still, the atmosphere, under a hazy sun, which burned away morning fog, was relaxed. After blessing participants at the end of the two-hour ceremony, the pope spoke briefly with a young girl who broke away from the crowd and headed for his chair.

Then John Paul was driven around the square in an open-sided "popemobile," stopping to kiss babies held out near him. In the afternoon, he made an impromptu appearance from his window overlooking St. Peter's Square, where hundreds of youths were still gathered.

The coming week will see John Paul preside at Holy Thursday services at the Vatican, a Good Friday procession at the Colosseum and Saturday night and Sunday morning Easter ceremonies.

John Paul, who turns 84 next month and who has Parkinson's disease, looked wan and weak as he clutched a braided palm at the start of the ceremony. But he later seemed to gain strength, nodding in pleasure at cheers and applause from the crowd.

The pontiff urged young people to prepare for World Youth Day in Cologne, Germany in the summer of 2005. But when a Berlin university student, in a TV hookup from that city, invited the pope to join them in Cologne, he didn't answer.

Cologne's Cardinal Joachim Meisner has said the pope will go "if God gives him the strength."

Security an issue for organizers

buses to navigate. The central location means the FleetCenter is closer to major thoroughfares, which now must be shut down for security reasons.

The small-town intimacy has also led to small-town spats.

"You have to take it all together," said Peggy Wilhide, communications director for the Democratic National Convention Committee. "That's what you get with an intense level of interest. Because it's a smaller city, I think there is a level of excitement here and a level of interest that you don't see in places like Los Angeles and New York."

Democratic organizers say that glitches are a normal part of convention planning, accentuated in Boston because of heightened security stemming from the terrorist attacks, both on Sept. 11 and, more recently, in Madrid.

Others within the party argue, however, that Massachusetts' unique brand of cutthroat politics is showing its face.

"All of this is politics: How do we embarrass Democrats, how do we embarrass John Kerry in his home state," said Michael Goldman, a Democratic political consultant. "Romney's made sure that at every turn the process of working with the commonwealth has gone slowly. He seems to be doing everything he can to screw it up."

It is not unusual for one national party to hold its convention in a city or state controlled by a politician from the opposite side. But in general, political observers say, partisan differences have been put aside for the good of the local economy, which stands to gain $125 million or more from the about 30,000 delegates, visitors and journalists.

The promise of an economic bonanza was enough to bring the two sides together in Philadelphia in 2000, when a Republican convention came to a city led by a Democratic mayor.

Israeli prime minister confronts Sharon over withdrawl plan

By JOSEF FEDERMAN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

JERUSALEM (AP) — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon engaged in a heated argument Sunday with hardline Cabinet ministers opposed to his plan to withdraw from the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank, government officials said.

The spat reflected the tough internal pressure that Sharon faces as he tries to move forward with his proposal.

The prime minister has proposed leaving the areas — removing troops and uprooting settlements in the process — to reduce friction between Israelis and Palestinians after more than three years of fighting. He has said he will carry out the plan next year if peace efforts with the Palestinians remain stalled.

In weekend interviews, Sharon said for the first time that Israel would pull out of all of Gaza, uprooting all the settlement there, reversing an earlier indication that three settlements in northern Gaza would remain.

The pullback in the West Bank would be much more limited — only four of about 135 settlements would be removed.

Palestinians charge that the plan is a ruse to trade Gaza for a permanent grasp over most of the West Bank. They insist that such moves must be coordinated with the U.S.-backed "road map" peace plan, which leads to a Palestinian state.

However, neither side has carried out its initial obligations under the plan, leading Sharon to his proposal for unilateral action. Sharon travels to Washington this month in hopes of winning an endorsement from President Bush.

The Sharon plan faces considerable opposition within his coalition government, and some hardline members have threatened to pull out, opposing in principle the dismantling of Jewish settlements and giving up control of territory.

During the weekly Cabinet meeting Sunday, hard-liners led by Tourism Minister Benny Elon, demanded Sharon immediately bring his plan to a Cabinet vote so members could decide whether to pull out of the coalition, according to officials in the meeting.

Sharon angrily told the hard-liners that the plan has not been made final, the officials said — and then pointedly invited them to leave the government if they were unhappy.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Gruesome, vivid photos in poor taste

Last Thursday, all over the world, newspapers ran extremely graphic photographs of what the United States government is calling the "horrific" killing of four Americans in Iraq. The bodies of the civilian victims who have yet to be identified were burned, dragged through the streets and eventually hung from a bridge. Of course, the media caught it all on camera.

American television determined the footage to be inappropriate for broadcast. "We made the call that it was too graphic in nature to put on our air," said Bill Shine of Fox. CBS news anchor Dan Rather agreed when he saw the images and decided that, even for adults, the images were too horrifying.

But the print media apparently did not share in this opinion. Papers like The New York Times, The Miami Herald and The Boston Herald displayed the most vivid and gruesome pictures on their front page. Most papers chose to run the pictures only on the inside pages and selected less shocking ones for the front page. Some also censored the pictures by blurring the bodies.

Other papers, like The Toledo (Ohio) Blade, did not print anything that showed the bodies of the victims.

"Why inflame the situation any more than necessary? We'd be doing exactly what the Iraqis want," said its managing editor Kurt Franck.

The incident, of course, got international coverage as well. Arab television stations showed a complete broadcast, including interviews with celebrating witnesses. In France, the footage of the bodies being dragged and hung was aired without censorship. And even in London, shots of the charred bodies hanging from the bridge were not filtered.

While sometimes it may be appropriate to set our guidelines by the rest of the world, this should not have been one of those cases. The victims in this case were American and so the American media should have been a little more sensitive to the circumstances than the news sources overseas.

It is of course important for the media to report the full news, and as Americans we have a right to know the full extent to which these horrific acts are being committed against our fellow citizens. On the other hand, there should be a line between what is necessary to get the message across and what could be potentially over the top. American tragedy should be reported, not exploited in order to sell more papers.

When trying to make decisions of this nature, it is important to remember that those four people are not just the names for big story; they are someone's family, someone's friends. They are real people who suffered tremendously and whose loved ones will now also be suffering. This situation must be treated with more sensitivity than they were yesterday.

We at The Massachusetts Daily Collegian would like to thank the fraction of the media that practiced good taste in reporting this story. We are all in this together, and we are here to provide the public with the information they need — not just to draw its attention with shocking material.

Information from The Boston Globe was used for this editorial.

THE SUNNI TRIANGLE

A deserving administration

Allison Edles

As a registered Democrat, it has become very easy for me (as well as the majority of the United States population and rest of the world) to join in the banter mocking President George Bush.

There have been books published making fun of the President's speeches and intelligence. Recently with the presidential campaign for 2004 underway, much of Hollywood has decided to join the rest of the world and ridicule the President in many of their scripts.

The Department of Labor announced today that 308,000 jobs were added last month, greatly increasing the job growth and providing much-needed employment to many American citizens. The Bush administration has faced many hardships resulting from and including the attacks on Sept. 11. Bush and his associates deserve more recognition for the good they have accomplished in a very trying time.

Such economic growth in the area of employment was much needed and helped many Americans find a job. For students attending a state-funded university, we can all appreciate the increase. Many students at the University of Massachusetts will be graduating at the end of the semester, not to mention the students graduating at hundreds of other colleges and universities across the nation. To have more available in terms of employment, specifically employment warranting a college degree, is a step in the right direction.

The Chicago Tribune reported that within one year after the attacks on Sept. 11, an estimated 146,100 jobs were lost just in the aftermath alone in New York City. That is to say nothing of the millions of people laid off in the months to come. Although 308,000 jobs may not be that many in comparison to the amount lost almost four years ago, it's definitely a step in the right direction.

In addition to the recent job increase, the Bush administration has also helped to decrease the rate of teenage pregnancy in the United States, and succeeded On Feb. 20, the Alan Guttmacher Institute, a nonprofit organization focused on sexual and reproductive health research, policy analysis, and public education, released a report announcing the decline of teenage pregnancy and abortion among all racial and ethnic groups and in every state in 2000. The drop in number is attributed to better use of contraception and less, or more cautious, sexual activity, according to the AGI. The decline is an undeniable accomplishment that the Bush administration should be proud of and deserves recognition for.

Hollywood has taken pains to point out all of the President's 'bad' policies and actions through many television shows currently on the air.

As Americans, we cannot soon forget the recent capture of Saddam Hussein back in December. After many American soldiers gave their lives for this country while trying to apprehend the Iraqi leader, it is somewhat comforting to know that their deaths were not in vain. It was through the administration's aggressive, and highly controversial, continuing efforts to capture Hussein, that he was eventually detained by American soldiers and will soon be brought to justice. While their tactics involving foreign affairs in Iraq presented much controversy, Hussein was ultimately captured and, thus, a major threat to America and many other countries was averted.

In life, there are always two sides to everything. President Bush has also backed a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriages, enforced antiterrorism laws, such as the PATRIOT Act, that hinder many rights of citizens, and has taken the American people on a wild-goose chase for weapons of mass destruction.

Hollywood has taken pains to point out all of the President's "bad" policies and actions through many television shows currently on the air. For example, on the NBC show, "Whoopi" starring Whoopi Goldberg, a supposed President Bush enters her establishment and asked to use the facilities. In response, while the "President" was in the bathroom, Whoopi's character said, "I can't believe he's in there doing to my bathroom what he's done to the economy!"

It is obvious that Bush and his administration appeal mostly to conservative Americans. And in this day and age, as liberalism seems to expand, his viewpoints clash more and more with the youth of America.

The administration has accomplished both good and bad in their four-year run so far. That is not to say that the good outweighs the bad or vice versa, but it merely goes to show that you can't please everyone.

When the presidential election rolls around in November, I will most certainly cast my vote for Kerry. But, that is not without acknowledging the accomplishments of the Bush administration, in addition to its flawed policies.

Kurt Cobain: looking back

Mark Ostroff

"...It's better to burn out than to fade away."
- Kurt Cobain, last words

"Kurt's dead, man! They think he killed himself!" I can still remember how my friend Bruce just blurted this out to me when I picked up the phone on a sunny day in April.

I didn't even tell my parents. I couldn't. They wouldn't have understood. It wasn't any ordinary guy sprawled on the floor of his garage, gun in hand. It was a man who had given meaning to a generation of adolescents, those who had fallen through the cracks of the American standard of normality.

It's hard to believe it's already been 10 years since Kurt Cobain ended his life at the age of 27. I was only 13 years old then, but still, I remember it like it was yesterday. And with the bittersweet memories I have of Kurt come the memories of a generation meticulously molded in his image, my generation.

We had long, unwashed hair, dyed every color of the spectrum. We had piercings hidden from our parents. Some of us already had tattoos. We wore long underwear under our torn jeans and rock n' roll shirts. We spent the days smoking marijuana and firing air rifles from rooftops, always aiming for the most expensive car we could find.

Some of us had dysfunctional families. Some were poor; some had it even worse. And Kurt's cult of personality was the only direction we had in our myopic world.

We'd go to school, only to be harassed and looked down upon. Nobody understood us. All they understood was that we were different, and different was wrong. We couldn't dance. We didn't keep up with the latest trends; we weren't attractive, and worst of all, we listened to "music for faggots," as they used to tell me.

Sometimes, all a kid had to look forward to was the end of the week, when he could forget about the American Schutzstaffeln-Juden for some time and go destroy some stolen textbooks, all to the screech of "Scentless Apprentice."

We tried writing our own music, which would be played on a $150 Fender Strat-Squire, always lacking the magic touch that only a depressed man from Seattle apparently had. We'd call our ill-fated garage bands names like "The Lizard Kings," "Spork" or "Torrance" (after the psychotic father in "The Shining").

Within hours of finding his body, thousands of fans poured onto his Seattle property. I remember how I wished I was one of them.

Nirvana became its own country — an inner utopia, pushing away a world where we were told we had it good, but knew we had it bad. Our creed was printed on the inner cover of Nirvana albums and our salute was a middle finger. When Kurt died, it was as if this whole world was made of glass all along.

Within hours of finding his body, thousands of fans poured onto his Seattle property. I remember how I wished I was one of them. There were obvious signs of distress — a mixture of sadness and hysteria — as many lost the only person in the world to whom they could relate.

Some of us even played with the idea that all of this was a joke, that he would come out on stage and ... no, no, it was real, all real and the first time someone ever drove home a sense of mortality in me.

Sometimes I would lay awake at night and wonder about the feeling someone got out of putting a shotgun to his face, fully intent on pulling the trigger. I could never conceive of it. It was too haunting.

It's hard for most people to conceive of the pain of someone who believes that pulling a trigger and falling to oblivion is the only possible way out. And so, problems like depression and suicide are still swept under the rug in a society where being openly miserable is deemed inappropriate.

"Suicide is sin," is what some people like to say, but sometimes, eternity in Hell is a minor risk of escaping the pain that many people feel. Kurt's life and death will always hold that meaning to me.

It means that even in the "greatest country on earth," there are people who, punished by the social vigilantism of corporate culture, still cry themselves to sleep at night, lonely people with grim thoughts about the future.

What would I say if I had the chance to talk Kurt out of what he was doing? Would I? Maybe he knew more than I did that he was better off where he was going. Maybe if he weren't alone, he would have changed his mind.

"Think about your daughter," I probably would have said. "She has your eyes, dude."

The truth of the Minutemen

Dr. Joseph S. Larson

Last spring the proposal to replace the University of Massachusetts Minuteman mascot with some other symbol triggered a firestorm in the national news media. While the Minuteman prevailed, few examined closely the claim that the Minuteman raised issues of gender, race and guns. "There were no Minutewomen," said some. "Minutemen were not people of color," said others, others did not like firearms.

But UMass scholars Sidney and Emma Kaplan ("The Black Presence in the Era of the American Revolution," UMass Press, 1989) tell us that the original Minutemen consisted of armed men and women, white, black and red. They repelled the British at Concord, Lexington and elsewhere, and fought at Bunker Hill. From Massachusetts alone, 840 minorities served in George Washington's Continental Army; 740 were recorded as black or mulatto and 100 recorded as Indians.

One Minutewoman, two months before the Battles of Concord and Lexington, came close to making Salem, Mass. the location of "the shot heard round the world." On Sunday, February 26, 1775, Sarah Tarrant called out to a British troop trying to find colonial arms in Salem, "Go home and tell your master he has sent you on a fool's errand and broken the peace of our Sabbath. What, do you think we were born in the woods, to be frightened by owls?" When a British redcoat leveled his musket at her she challenged him, saying, "Fire if you have the courage, but I doubt it." No shots were fired. The British retreated, playing the same tune that General Cornwallis' British army band would later play at his surrender at Yorktown, "The World's Turned Upside Down."

No symbol for UMass students and alumni, men and women of all hues, could be more appropriate than the Minuteman.

On that "famous day and year," April 19, 1775, at least 11 black Minutemen from Lexington, Framingham, Braintree, Brookline, Concord, Groton, Cambridge and Stoneham responded to Paul Revere's midnight alarm. On Lexington Green, in the first firefight of the revolution, black Minuteman and slave Prince Estabrook was among the wounded. His role is recalled each year in Lexington's re-enactment of the battle.

Also present at Lexington, in the British line, was Marine Major John Pitcairn. Facing him in the Patriot line was black Minuteman Peter Salem. The two were to meet again at the Battle of Bunker Hill. There, Salem was among the group of Minutemen credited with killing Major Pitcairn in the third and final British charge. Peter Salem was later presented to Gen. George Washington in recognition of his service. John Trumbell's famous 1798 painting, "The Battle of Bunker's Hill," hanging now in the Library of Congress, prominently portrays black Minutemen in the Patriot line of battle.

Shortly after the Battle of Concord and Lexington, Prudence Cumming Wright, commanded a Patriot band that also included Sarah Hartwell Shattuck. Armed with muskets and pitchforks, their task was to repel British troops making more sorties to capture colonial arms. They took positions at Jewett's Bridge over the Nashua River between Groton and Pepperell. There they intercepted and captured Tory Capt. Leonard Whiting, who was acting as a British courier.

American Indian Minutemen included a company from Stockbridge that responded following the Concord and Lexington battle. Indian Minutemen engaged the British at Noddle's Island in Boston and at Cambridge. Seventy Indian women of Mashpee became widows of Minutemen and by the end of the Revolutionary War, half of the Stockbridge Indian Minutemen had lost their lives.

As for the Minuteman's musket, how else were men and women to lift the military yoke of the world's most mighty empire? Meliscent Barrett Swain ran the Concord musket cartridge factory, a target of the fateful British expedition. Elizabeth Hager Price, while nursing Minutemen wounded at Concord, discovered six spiked cannons left behind by the British. She recognized that they could be repaired, had them hauled to a blacksmith's shop and helped put them back in service for the Patriots.

The official heroine of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is Deborah Sampson Gannett. Disguised as a man, she enlisted in the Fourth Massachusetts Regiment under the name of Robert Shurtleff. The first female to enlist as an American soldier, Deborah was wounded at the Battle of Tarrytown. Upon recommendation of Paul Revere, she was later awarded the first military pension granted to a woman. Her pension was approved by John Hancock.

No discussion of the Minuteman as a symbol of UMass would be complete without mention of the special tie between the Amherst campus and the sculptor of the original Minuteman statue. The first president of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, Henry Flagg French, had a son who worked on the campus farm before the first student class arrived in Amherst. President French later referred to his son as "the first graduate of Massachusetts Agricultural College." The French home was the Stockbridge House, still standing on the campus, now housing the University Club. The French boy drew imaginative pictures on his bedroom wall and went on to make the Minuteman statue at Concord his first public work of art. His name was Daniel Chester French, also sculptor of the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D.C.

No symbol for UMass students and alumni, men and women of all hues, could be more appropriate than the Minuteman. On April 19, we will again acknowledge that we will forever be in their debt, those original Minutemen and Minutewomen. They laid the foundations of our government. From this government arose the freedoms of speech, free association and open enquiry so necessary to the functioning of our society.

Lively music from Death Cab for Cutie

By Cameron J. Woods
Collegian Staff

After four years of struggling in the belly of the music industry beast and a handful of albums, Death Cab for Cutie has finally broken through into the heavy rotation. Tonight this sleeper band will perform at Northampton's Pearl Street Night Club, in support of their latest release, "Transatlanticism."

With their recent smash "The Sound of Settling" the Death Cab boys have taken a step away from their original sound and opted for a more pop-alt sound, that makes for a great earbug.

This emo quartet is fronted by the clear vocals of Ben Gibbard, formerly of The Postal Service, and is supported by the almost classic guitar style of Christopher Walla, the steady bass backing of Nicholas Harmer and the talented percussion accompaniment of Michael Schorr. This group, hailing mostly from the Pacific Northwest, has built up an underground following that may very well out live its current 15 minutes.

With a history of innovative yet not alienating sound and thoughtful lyrics, Death Cab's sound is a very deliberate product, and for the most part it is a nicely polished product that gets stuck in your head. Perhaps the one major hitch in the bands sound lies in the full, grammatically correct sentences insisted upon by Gibbard. Though it is the rare bird that even considers any semblance of grammatical correctness in their singing, in some cases Gibbard just seems to be cramming way too many words into a line. It is a cool thing to be able to hear what a singer is actually singing and not have to crack open your Kant to decipher what he means, but it does get to be a bit unwieldy at times.

Much like most of the emerging music scene, Death Cab has a sort of unfinished edge to their sound. This perpetual garageness shows up as the random fuzzes of static and feedback squelches that have made other bands such as The White Stripes, Jet and The Vines at least momentary stars. Though they share in most of the bells and whistles of the common lot there is something to the presentation of this band that sets them slightly apart from the herd. This jene se qua; be it stage presence or simply a unique spirit is almost palpable in each of the bands songs.

Performing with Death Cab for Cutie will be Ben Kweller. The New York native singer/songwriter recently finished his second full-length compact disc, "On My Way," which is due in stores this Tuesday.

Kweller made a name for himself as an eclectic genre hopper with his first disc "Sha Sha" but his new disc promises to be more uniform but no less masterful.

In a genre recently saturated with big names such as Howie Day and John Mayer, Kweller is in an uncomfortable place for a fledgling artist. He could ride the wave to stardom or simply get bulled over and forgotten. Musical Darwinism in action, one could say.

Stiles brings new life into old fairy tale

By Tammi Munn
Collegian Staff

Every girl dreams of the day when Prince Charming will come and sweep her off her feet, but what if the man of her dreams is a real bonafide prince? Oh come on, hasn't this been done before?

We've seen it before. Average girl meets rich and famous boy and they find some way to work it out. So how could "Prince and Me" be any different? The girl, Paige Morgan (Julia Stiles), is not a low class servant who is fickle about love, waiting around for a man. She is a pre-med University of Wisconsin student and doesn't want to come even remotely close to love as she watches her friends driven Paige at the bar she works at. She definitely doesn't completely fulfill the workaholic stereotype if she can work at the bar until late at night. When does she have the time to study? Eddie really wants to know if a girl will flash him so he casually asks her to lift her shirt. So.

Paige thinks Eddie is a creep; and he, most decidedly, will not give up. Surprise, surprise.

He clumsily tries to fit into everyday life and complete everyday tasks while his valet makes him eggs benedict for breakfast. It's a good laugh to see him learn how to work alongside Paige in the bar, cleaning restaurant mats while his valet offers to take over. Then he has to wrestle steer on Paige's family farm during Thanksgiving break. They amazingly come closer together with each thing he does, but Paige keeps her distance and stays focused on her goals.

She has a weakness in her studies, however: Shakespeare. Of course Eddie is brilliant when it comes to Shakespeare and he begins to tutor her on the subject. Again, another surprise. She finally drops her defenses, and they get caught up in a whirlwind romance. She hates him and then she loves him in a very short amount of time. Right when she officially recognizes she is in love with him, she discovers his secret.

become engaged and married. Perhaps this is a modern day scenario of a fairy tale involving newer dreams of a successful career and changing the world, before getting married.

The prince is a not-so-typical character as well. He is the racy Prince Edvard of Denmark (Luke Mably) who would rather be out racing the king and queen's luxurious cars and kissing beautiful women instead of playing his part in Denmark's politics. He wants a change of scenery and instantly sees a promotion on television for a video of flashing coeds from the University of Wisconsin. Of course, he and his valet (Ben Miller) are now off to Wisconsin to see what they shall see.

Prince Edvard, now Eddie, ditching his princely persona, enrolls in the University and becomes involved in the splendor of dorm life. He eventually meets up with the studious and work

A quick forgive and forget moment happens with Paige and she tries to find her beloved prince, only to discover that he is back in Denmark because of the king's failing health.

Eddie and Paige go through all the pain and frustration of love as they are forced to try to reconcile their class differences and Paige is finally forced to decide between becoming a queen to a country she has barely seen or becoming a doctor and delivering vaccines to developing countries.

This film really isn't all that bad. In fact, there are many laughs and possibly a few tears. Maybe all the clichés put together made it work, maybe you have to be a hopeless romantic to appreciate this film, or maybe, just maybe, fairy tales really don't get too old.

New Disney animation embraces classic style and new stories

Mrs. Caloway (Judi Dench), Maggie (Roseanne Barr) and Grace (Jennifer Tilly) take a break from saving their home.

By Lauren Freeman

"Home on the Range," the newest Disney animated feature, showcases the voice talents of Roseanne Barr, Dame Judi Dench and Jennifer Tilly as the three bounty hunting cows, Maggie (Barr), Mrs. Caloway (Dench) and Grace (Tilly).

As Disney does best, the character's personalities are fully developed 10 minutes into the film. Maggie is an attention-loving show cow (three-time winner of the Golden Udder Award and the original Happy Heifer). But her owner had to sell her to Patch of Heaven, because his cattle were taken by the notorious cattle-robber, Alameda Slim.

According to the film's production notes, Barr muses, "The character of Maggie was like a real person to me. I thought of her as a person who just happened to be a cow. I know she's a cartoon, but there's a lot of depth to these characters. To play this role, I was fortunately able to connect with, what do you call it, my 'inner cow.'"

Caloway is the ruler-of-the-roost before Maggie arrives. She is authoritative and short-tempered. She's even highly protective of the stylish hat she wears. Dame Judi Dench claims, "I love cows, so being asked to play a cow, called Mrs. Caloway, with a charming hat, who could resist that?"

The third cow to grace the silver screen was Grace, a skinny, young bovine with a passion for new-age thinking and peaceful conflict resolutions.

When Maggie comes to the farm and stirs things up, Caloway is less than pleased. However, shortly after Maggie's arrival, Pearl, the farm's owner, has to come up with a quick $750 or her farm will be auctioned.

Maggie is the organizing force behind the three bovines' search for Alameda Slim (voiced by Randy Quaid), whose bounty just happens to be $750. The three cows have to race head to head with Rico, the tough guy bounty hunter of the West and Buck (Cuba Gooding, Jr.), the over ambitious stallion and one of the funniest characters in the story.

Along with great characterizations, Disney movies are notorious for soundtracks full of catchy songs. "Home on the Range" features the work of Oscar-winning composer Alan Menken, whose work for Disney includes the musical scores of "The Little Mermaid," "Beauty and the Beast" and "Aladdin."

"I want to provide an audience with a song that is something to take away with them ... It should be something that, once somebody's heard it, belongs to them for the rest of their lives," Menken said.

"Home on the Range" is a hybrid kind of musical. Two of the songs are sung by characters in the film, and the rest are under the action," he continued. "This was quite different from the musicals I have written in the past, where the characters break into song. It was fun and challenging at the same time." Bonnie Raitt, K.D. Lang and Tim McGraw perform songs featured in the film.

Although a Disney movie is a great outlet for a songwriter to reach a large audience, according to Lang, this was not her sole motivation for joining the Disney team.

"Being an animal rights activist, I was really excited about the fact that the animals were saving the farm," Lang said. "I love animation, especially when it puts animals in a compassionate light. I think that's something children of all ages need to be reminded of. Animals are a very important cog in the wheel of life. It's very honorable to be part of this film."

Even more important is the fact that Disney finally came out with a feature film that depicts strong female heroes who are motivated by something other than winning the love of a male character. In fact, these three cows are refreshingly (though mildly) hostile to their male counterparts.

Walt Disney Studios hasn't yet given up on hand-drawn animation. Unfortunately, the film will be unable to compete with the computer animated "Scooby Doo 2: Monsters Unleashed," the competing kid's feature this month that brought in over $30 million in box office last weekend. A pale comparison. Friday's release of "Home on the Range" only brought in $4 million.

But all hope is not lost. "Home on the Range" is a prime example of that old fashioned art technique children's movie lovers should not be willing to let slip into the cracks of technological advancement. Any Disney fan knows that.

Okafor's long, strange trip to the NCAA final

By Eddie Pells
Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO (AP) — Few people draw the distinction between life and basketball more clearly than Emeka Okafor, the star center for Connecticut.

The son of a man who grew up in war-ravaged Nigeria, Okafor has led an easy life by comparison, and he's the first to concede that.

"My dad's high school education was interrupted by a civil war and they weren't sure they were going to eat the next day," Okafor said. "And here I am in the United States wondering what I'm going to get for Christmas."

On Monday, Okafor will lead UConn against Georgia Tech in the national final, hoping to push the Huskies to one half of a possible sweep of the men's and women's championships. The Connecticut women were to play Minnesota late Sunday in the national semifinals.

A win for the guys would mark the crowning achievement on the basketball court for Okafor, although it would be only part of the picture in his well-rounded life.

The 6-foot-10 All-American, who averages 17 points and 11 rebounds, will earn his degree in finance in May with a 3.8 grade-point average. After that, he'll probably be a top-five pick in the NBA draft in June.

It took Okafor just three years to earn his degree, an impressive accomplishment that doesn't surprise those who know him. Okafor shrugs it off, calling it more a matter of circumstance than anything great he did.

"I was at school in the summer working on basketball, so I decided to take some classes while I was there," he said.
In his eyes, the successes on the court and in the classroom are equally important.

"They go hand in hand, they're both a part of me," he said. "I can't say I'm more proud of one than the other. Not many people graduate in three years. Not many people do what I've done. But it's because I had the opportunity."

He had it thanks to the decision his father, Pius, made in 1974 to move to America, where he went to college and worked odd jobs to help pay the bills. A few years later, Pius was on a trip back to Africa when he met his wife, Celestina, a registered nurse.

Emeka — his given name is Chukwuemeka Ndubisi Okafor — was born in 1982. He and his sister moved between Oklahoma and Texas while his dad pursued his education and better jobs. By watching his parents succeed, Emeka learned about the value of a hard day's work and about the abundant opportunities available in the United States.

He worked hard in school and got good grades — his mother tells a story of him crying about a B he received on his fourth-grade report card — and also worked on his basketball game. He never gave up when he was told, as a high school sophomore in Houston, that he wasn't good enough to start the season on the varsity team.

"His freshman year he played because he enjoyed playing," said his high school coach, Dave Hudek. "I didn't start him out on the varsity because I didn't think he was ready."

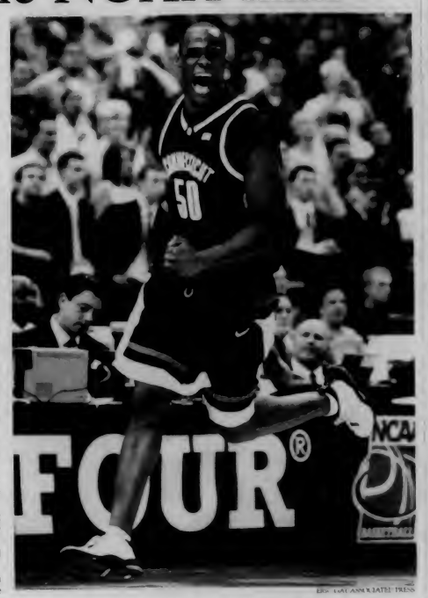
As high school went on, Okafor started taking his game more seriously. Coaches like Jim Calhoun of UConn and Paul Hewitt of Georgia Tech started taking a look, thinking it wouldn't be bad to have the lanky center to develop over a few years.

Okafor didn't think much of UConn at first, and when he met Calhoun, the coach's heavy New England accent threw him off.

"There were a lot of 'Whats?' when we met," Okafor said. "But he came in, talked about the situation. I decided to roll the dice and go to UConn."
Okafor has steadily progressed with the Huskies, going from a freshman who averaged eight points and barely drew a defender, to an inside force who can completely control a game.

In the semifinals against Duke, he got into early foul trouble and sat on the bench for the last 16 minutes of the first half. In the second half, he scored all 17 of his points and grabbed seven of his eight rebounds. That, plus the defense he played by swatting away shots with his long arms, was the difference in a 79-78 win.

"He was just so focused into winning that basketball game that he took it upon himself," Calhoun said.



Of course, Okafor is only one of the stars at UConn, and the men's team is only half of perhaps the best one-two basketball combo in the country.

Led by Diana Taurasi, the Connecticut women gave the Huskies a good chance to become the first program to win men's and women's championships in the same season. Both teams were ranked No. 1 going into the season.

"They told us, 'You take care of your part, we'll take care of ours,' " Connecticut forward Rashad Anderson said.

If the men pull it off, it's almost certain Okafor will be a big part of it.

"You can't really put a price tag on the experience," he said. "Mine is a unique one. I wouldn't trade it for the world. For me, it's one of the best times of my life."

Ailing Roddick wins

By Steven Wine
Associated Press

KEY BISCAYNE, Fla. (AP) — Andy Roddick battled a queasy stomach in the final of the Nasdaq-100 Open, and he was the healthiest player on the court.

The curse of Key Biscayne struck again Sunday, and it hit Guillermo Coria hardest. He retired because of back spasms after losing the first three points of the fourth set trailing 6-7 (2), 6-3, 6-1.

It's the fourth time in 15 years that the men's final has been affected by an ailing player. Roddick acknowledged he could have done worse than a little nausea.

"I'll take sick to my stomach over injured any day," Roddick said. "I was definitely working with the lesser of two evils."

Coria said he hurt his back in the first set. Trailing 6-5, he received treatment during a changeover, then played a flawless tiebreaker to pull out the set.

But Coria walked to the chair frowning and shaking his head and threw his racket at his bag. As Roddick took control in the second and third sets, Coria occasionally clutched his back between points, and his movement and serve were clearly affected.

"Guillermo slowed by an injury is still faster than about 95 percent of the guys on tour," Roddick said. "But it's tough playing with an injury."

After hitting a forehand into the net in the first game of the final set, Coria waved his hands in frustration and walked to the net to concede.

"The pain was excruciating, and I was having trouble serving," said Coria, who lost serve five times. "I knew after I won the first set I was not going to be able to finish."
Roddick felt less than terrific himself. He said he woke up sick to his stomach, and the queasiness lingered during the match.

"I was battling," he said. "I was trying to maybe bluff my way through, because I knew he was hurt, too."

Maybe there's something in the water that surrounds the island, given Key Biscayne's tradition of tainted finals.

— In 1989, Thomas Muster was unable to play because he hurt his knee when hit by a car hours after winning his semifinal match.

— In 1994, Pete Sampras nearly defaulted because of a stomach ailment, but in a sporting gesture, Andre Agassi declined the walkover victory to give his rival an hour to recover. Sampras then won the match.

Roddick knows the history well, because he grew up in nearby Boca Raton and watched matches from the upper deck as a youngster. That made his first title in the event especially sweet, Coria's injury notwithstanding.

"It's not the picture-perfect ending," Roddick said. "It's not the way you want to win a tournament. But at the same, I'm here at the end of the day. That was my goal coming into the tournament."

Before Coria's injury, the match had the trappings of an exciting final, with perfect weather, a capacity crowd and a Davis Cup atmosphere. Some fans waved Argentine flags, while others chanted "U-S-A."

"I feel very disappointed for the crowd," Coria said. "I felt like I was playing in Argentina."

Roddick hit 11 aces, the fastest of which reached 143 mph. He lost only six of 45 points on his first serve, and played steadily from the baseline, even fooling Coria twice with drop shots.

"Midway through the second set, I stepped up in all areas of my game," Roddick said. "I wasn't going to beat him just rallying. I started going for my shots more."

Roddick reached a milestone by improving his career record to 200-67 and leads the ATP Tour in victories this year with a record of 26-5. He has won the past eight finals he has played and will climb in Monday's rankings from third to second behind No. 1 Roger Federer.

The 21-year-old Roddick earned $533,350 and became the sixth American to win the men's championship. Sampras was also 21 when he won the first of his three Key Biscayne titles. Agassi won the first of his six titles in the event at 19.

Coria settled for $266,675, and fans were left to wonder: Had he stayed healthy, how would the match have gone?

"Longer," Roddick said.

Bruins clinch division

"We're thrilled," Bruins coach Mike Sullivan said. "We had an opportunity to win our division, arguably the best division in the NHL. That was something we wanted to accomplish."

Green put the Bruins ahead 57 seconds after the opening faceoff. Murray made a check behind the goal line that allowed Patrice Bergeron to pass the puck in front. It hit off the skate of the Devils' John Madden, and Green fired it past Brodeur.

Murray stretched the lead to 2-0 with Turner Stevenson off for tripping. Nick Boynton took a shot from the point that Michael Nylander and Knuble touched in front before Murray scored on the rebound.

Samsonov beat Brodeur with a shot from above the left circle after taking a drop pass from Nylander to make it 3-0. Patrik Elias had the Devils' best chances in the first two periods. He had a power-play shot hit off the post in the first period and he was stopped in close by Raycroft in the second period, when chants of "Let's go Islanders" could be heard in the arena.

It didn't work.

Raycroft lost his shutout when Jamie Langenbrunner scored on a power play with less than nine minutes to play.

The game got a little chippy in the final 10 minutes after Bruins defenseman Dan McGillis hit Brian Gionta with an elbow in the head. Hal Gill of Boston and Stevenson fought during the ensuing power play.

Notes: Devils D Brian Rafalski returned to the lineup after missing 12 games with a broken leg. ... The Devils finished with a season-low 14 shots. Their previous season low 17 on two occasions. The Devils set an NHL record allowing 164 goals, the fewest allowed in an 80-game plus season. St. Louis had the old mark, 165 in 1999-2000.

ahead by a couple of goals, it's a big help to what you're trying to do," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Especially at a place like Penn State."

After UMass opened up with its five-goal first, the Nittany Lions scored two on extra-man opportunities, and after a mostly even second quarter, they looked like they might threaten to tie the game with goals from Eremus and Will Jones that came just 34 seconds apart. Glenz's goal in the final minute slowed the Penn State momentum, however, and a Marc Young goal with five seconds left in the half wasn't enough to turn things around.

UMass continued to hold an offensive edge in the second half, and outscored the Nittany Lions 4-1 in both the third and fourth quarters, with goals from Matt and Gene Tundo, Glenz, Chris Doyle, Jamie Yaman, and the first of the season for freshman Clay Stabert.

In the Minutemen's first game on grass since their 10-5 loss to Brown at Harvard's Jordan Field on March 20, ground balls took a heightened value, and UMass edged the Nittany Lions 40-37. Penn State's Greg Gurenlian picked up 12 ground balls, but the Minutemen countered with at least two ground ball pickups from 10 different players.

Penn State outdueled the Minutemen on faceoffs, 15-12, but Dane Collins grabbed a number of clutch draws in the second half to help UMass hold onto the lead.

"The kid (Penn State's Gurenlian) was popping it out on Dane," Cannella said. "It was a situation where the faceoff guy goes down on his top hand and pops it out in front of him. We told Dane to get down on the line on the guy, box him out and turn it around. Dane did a real nice job in the second half, and our wings did a nice job picking up ground balls in the second half. We told the guys that ground balls would be a huge factor going into the game."

Gene Tundo's four assists led the Minutemen, who picked up 10 helpers in all — not including a large number of the "hockey assists" that Cannella likes to credit to players who set up the plays that lead to goals.

backed his stature as the new staff ace and belied his career numbers against Boston coming in: 1-9 and a 6.56 ERA in 12 games.

B.J. Ryan got five outs for the save.

There was some concern among Boston fans this spring that Martinez lost some velocity on his fastball, but on this night the pitch was clocked frequently at 91 mph.

It was his wildness, not his fastball, that got him in trouble.

After wasting two hits in the first inning, Baltimore went up 3-0 in the second. Lopez homered on the first pitch he saw with the Orioles, driving an 89 mph fastball into the left-field seats against Martinez, who gave up only seven homers last season.

Jay Gibbons followed with a single and David Segui was plunked in the back with a pitch before Larry Bigbie hit a tapper in front of the plate that Martinez fielded and threw wildly to first, allowing Gibbons to score. Luis Matos then hit an RBI single.

Manny Ramirez singled in a run to make it 3-1 in the third. The Red Sox put runners on second and third with two outs in the fourth before newcomer Pokey Reese inexplicably bunted and was easily thrown out.

With two on and two outs in the Boston fifth, Ponson struck out Kevin Millar on three pitches.

Baltimore reliever Rodrigo Lopez snuffed a two-on, two-out threat in the sixth, and the Orioles pulled away with a three-run seventh against Mike Timlin. After Melvin Mora walked and Tejada singled with two outs, Palmeiro hit an RBI single and Javy Lopez doubled in two runs.

Martinez burned in first loss

By David Ginsburg
Associated Press

BALTIMORE (AP) — One bad inning did in Pedro Martinez, just like last October.

Javy Lopez homered and drove in three runs, and fellow newcomers Rafael Palmeiro and Miguel Tejada both had two hits to lead the Orioles over the Boston Red Sox 7-2 Sunday night in Lee Mazzilli's first game as Baltimore's manager.

Martinez experienced an uncharacteristic lapse in control while yielding three second-inning runs. The Red Sox fell behind the New York Yankees (1-1) in the AL East for the first time this season by virtue of the opening-night loss.

Signed as free agents during a busy winter for the Orioles, Lopez, Palmeiro and Tejada combined to go 7-for-11 with three runs and four RBIs. Tejada was also perfect on 12 chances at shortstop.

Martinez was the loser, giving up three runs, two earned, and seven hits in six innings. He struck out five, walked one and hit a batter.

It was his first appearance in a game that counted since Oct. 16, when the three-time Cy Young Award winner blew a 5-2 lead against the Yankees in Game 7 of the AL championship series, and New York went on to win 6-5 in 11 innings.

Boston ultimately fired manager Grady Little for, among other things, leaving a tiring Martinez in too long.

Little's successor, Terry Francona, watched the Red Sox strand 14 runners against Sidney Ponson and three relievers in temperatures that dipped into the 30s.

Ponson, the winner, allowed one run, seven hits and three walks in 5 2-3 innings. His fine effort

UM trounces Penn State in ECAC opener

After a so-so start, and a season-threatening injury to its top scorer, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team seemed to be bound to the miss the high expectations it faced after last year's 13-3 season.

Although there are still five games left in their season — three against ranked teams — it would appear that the Minutemen (5-4, 1-0 Eastern College Athletic Conference) have broken free of their muddling early season, evidenced by a 17-8 win over Penn State (3-4, 0-2 ECAC) Saturday.

Penn State	8

A five-goal first quarter pushed UMass into a lead it never relinquished, bolstered by hat tricks from Neil Lundburg, Matt Tundo, and Kevin Glenz, who scored four goals on the day.

Glenz also provided the eventual game winner, when he scooped up a loose ball in front of the Penn State net with 29 seconds left in the first half, and put it home to make the score 9-6 and stifle a two-goal run by the Nittany Lions.

The Minutemen flew out of the gates, scoring five goals in the first 13 minutes. Lundburg notched two of his three in the outburst, and Glenz scored his first of the game.

The Nittany Lions didn't retaliate until there were 50 seconds left in the opening stanza, when John Fremus scored off an assist from Gil Pearsall. By that time, though, the damage was mostly done, and Penn State never closed the deficit to less than two goals.

Boston Bruins goaltender Andrew Raycroft, center, is congratulated by teammates after the Bruins beat the New Jersey Devils 3-1, Sunday in East Rutherford, N.J. Raycroft made 13 saves in the win.

B's down NJ, win Northeast Division title

By Tom Canavan
Associated Press

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. (AP) — The Boston Bruins earned an edge for at least the first two rounds of the playoffs by making the New Jersey Devils' road to consecutive Stanley Cup titles a little tougher.

Glen Murray set up a goal and scored another in a big first-period, and the Bruins won the Northeast Division title and helped take away the Atlantic Division crown from the Devils with a 3-1 win on Sunday.

"It's absolutely a relief," goaltender Andrew Raycroft said after the Bruins bounced back from a loss at home to New Jersey to win the division. "It's a huge win going into the playoffs, coming on the road and beating New Jersey at home. It gives us a lot of confidence."

Devils	1

The Bruins, who played without star center Joe Thornton for the second straight game because of what's being called an upper body injury by the team, will face the Montreal Canadiens in a best-of-7 series starting on Wednesday in Boston.

The Bruins, the second seed in the Eastern Conference, won the season series with the seventh-seeded Canadiens 3-0-1-2.

"I think our confidence going in is as good as it has ever been since I've been here," Bruins forward Mike Knuble said. "Guys around here, I don't know if it's the lockout or what, but guys are ready to bear down and play well."

The Devils didn't do that in blowing a chance to win a second straight division title. New Jersey would have won the Atlantic with a second straight win over the Bruins. However, the Devils come out flat in the first period, letting the Bruins score three times.

Coupled with the Flyers' 3-3 tie with the New York Islanders, the Devils finished a point behind Philadelphia in the Atlantic Division.

The Flyers, the third seed, will now have home-ice advantage in their first-round series with New Jersey, the sixth seed. Philadelphia won the season series, taking the final three games.

"It is a big deal," Devils goaltender Martin Brodeur said. "We had a chance. It was in our hands. They (the Bruins) really wanted it. I thought we played pretty good but they got some breaks early and they sat on the lead."

The Devils posted a 12-1 record at the Continental Airlines Arena last year in winning their third title since 1995.

Travis Green and Sergei Samsonov also scored for Boston, while Raycroft made 13 saves.

After failing to win the division title at home Saturday in a 5-2 loss to the Devils, the Bruins needed a win to secure their second division title in three years.

While they were without Thornton, the good news was the Bruins were on the road, where they had gotten points in 15 of their last 16 games.

The Bruins dominated from the start, scoring twice in the opening 2:51 and three times in the first 15:17 while limiting New Jersey to one shot.

Minutewomen break a trend

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

Aside from receiving free T-shirts, fans of the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team had something to cheer about, as they watched the Minutewomen snap a six-game losing streak against Duquesne yesterday, 12-11, on Fan Appreciation Day.

UMass	12

An unassisted goal from Kerry Connerty with 5:40 remaining in regulation proved to be the game winner, as the Minutewomen captured their first victory since besting Holy Cross 9-6 to start the season.

Duquesne rode into Amherst unbeaten in its last six, leading the Atlantic 10 with a 7-2 (2-0 A-10) record.

"This game was extremely important to us, we played well as a unit and beat the best team in the A-10," said junior midfielder Maura McGarrity, who led the Minutewomen with four points on three goals and an assist.

McGarrity's hat trick included the tying goal coming with 7:38 left in the second half. After leading the team in shots through the first seven games (32), McGarrity was able to find her stride as she slashed through the defense on dodges from the eight-meter hash.

UMass jumped out to an early lead 2-0 lead when Briana Bubeck scored on a free position shot, and Hope Zelinger found Kristin St. Hilaire 4:54 later. After the Dukes responded with a pair of goals, UMass tri-captain Tracy Drown netted an unassisted goal at 15:36, setting the stage for a punch-for-punch battle. Duquesne went on a 5-2 run to end the half, and took a 7-5 lead into the locker room.

Charging out of the gates to start the second frame, UMass scored four unanswered goals to take a 9-7 lead. In her first game back since being sidelined for two games with a kidney injury, Lindsay Cassell started the surge by putting home an assist from Drown at 1:03 of the second. After Stacie Pollock of Duquesne was sent off the field for a three-minute infraction, Bubeck took advantage of the extra attacker by tying the game on a bounce-shot at 11:24. Duquesne managed to tie the game at 9-9, 10-10, and 11-11, before Connerty scored the go-ahead goal en route to the season's first upset.

At 2-7, UMass is still in contention to make the A-10 tournament. Since the Dukes were their first conference foe, the Minutewomen are a perfect 1-0, with hopes of finishing among the top-four qualifying teams.

"I know how good we can play, we almost beat Syracuse and BU and both those teams are nationally ranked," UMass coach Carrie Bolduc said. "Duquesne was [the first] A-10 opponent and we understood how important [the game] was."

Before yesterday, the Achilles heel for UMass had been maintaining leads in the final five minutes. Despite owning a lead in the concluding minutes of four eventual losses, UMass was never able to run out the clock.

To answer the problem, the Minutewomen came out firing against the Dukes, dodging and shooting rather than stalling with under two minutes to play. With a 12-11 lead, UMass was able to seal the win by attacking the net, and beating Duquesne to the sideline after shots UMass maintained possession during most of the final 5:40 of scoreless play.

"Our problems seemed to come in the final two minutes when we tried running around and preventing the other team from stealing the ball," Bolduc said. "This game we attacked until the final horn, using motion and [aggressively] attacking by going to the cage."

The UMass defense was anchored by junior Kristin St. Hilaire, who spent the game shadowing the two-time Inside Lacrosse Player of the Week Honorable Mention, Ginger Flocco. Flocco, the Dukes' leader in goals and points, was held to three goals on the day.

Controversy: SGA elections

Precedent for Judiciary's challenge of Instant Runoff Voting set in 1998

By Melissa Blanksteen
Collegian Staff

Keeping the history of the Student Government Association's past elections in mind, the controversy surrounding last week's elections should not have been a surprise.

"SGA always violates the bylaws, but not [with malice]," said Jason Bissonnette, former secretary of Administrative Affairs. He cited the fact that people are primarily new candidates every election cycle, as a contributor to the problem.

In 2000, the Senate elections were thrown out. The SGA operated without a Senate from November to February. In 2001, there were concerns over a missing ballot box.

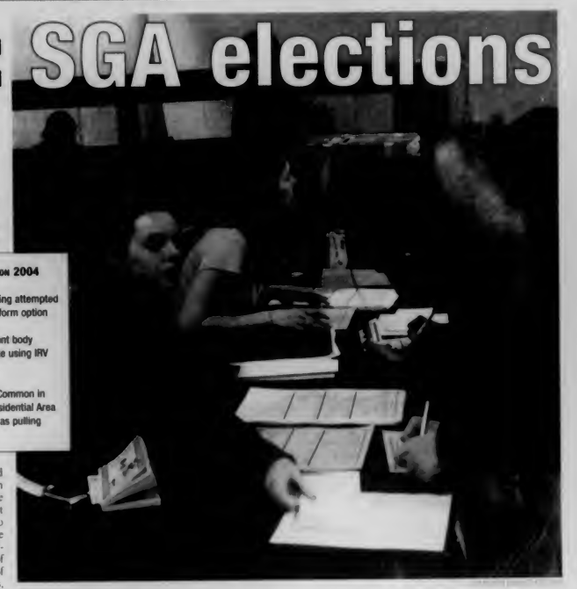
Yet, the presidential and trustee elections have not been thrown out since 1999. Many senators back then were concerned about the precedent the 1998 election would set. When the 2004 Judiciary filed its ruling last Friday, it included a copy of the Judiciary's 1998 ruling, which seems to prove those now-graduated senators of 1998 right.

To understand the magnitude of the 1998 elections, students need to understand what happened during last week. With that information in mind, the 1998 elections will seem that much more relevant to the issue at hand.

2004's Election

The story of this semesters president and trustee elections starts last October when Steve Hoeschele was elected chancellor of elections.

Hoeschele is a self-proclaimed activist for Instant Run-off Voting (IRV), telling the justices last week that he spends much of his free time outside of SGA working on spreading the IRV word.



When he came to Senate to take his place as chancellor, then-Attorney General Mark Morrison grilled him on IRV. Morrison did not think that IRV would work within the SGA Constitution because of a conflict with the "majority or plurality" clause.

Last week the Judiciary agreed. In their ruling, they explained that under the IRV system a candidate may win the plurality of, or the most, votes, but lose the elections. This situation did not happen last week. In presidential candidate Eduardo Bustamante's election and trustee candidate Matthew Murphy's recounted vote, both candidates won the first round and the final round of counting. However, because the possibility of winning the plurality but not the majority exists, the Judiciary ruled it unconstitutional.

Key points of Election 2004

- Instant Runoff Voting attempted as an electoral reform option
- Uninformed student body unprepared to vote using IRV ballots
- Berkshire Dining Common in the Southwest Residential Area was not available as polling station

Members of the fraternity will be camping out on the lawn this week until the group reaches its $1,500 goal.

Yesterday's ice-cold winds didn't keep the brothers of Sigma Phi Epsilon from camping out across from the Student Union in an effort to raise money for the Cancer Society of America.

The brothers will be outside camping all day and night this week and won't be leaving until they raise $1,500 for the charity.

"This event was started by a brother whose mom died of cancer and it's been a tradition in our house as of last year," said Dan Delloiacono, a senior political science major.

One of the brothers is also a cancer survivor, making the event more personal for everyone in SigEp.

According to Dan Ludwig, vice president of communications for SigEp, the brothers hope to reach their goal by Friday but will remain outside even longer until they reach that amount.

"We're staying here. We mean business," said Erik Diamond, a senior.

Last year's camp-out raised over $1,200 in just three days, and they plan to increase their goal each year.

"We decided to take a longer time frame [this year] because we upped the ante," said Wilfred Morin, a second semester freshman civil engineering major and the fraternity's philanthropy chair. He said that so far the response has been very positive.

"People have been great, they donate whatever they've got," said Morin.

He added that being out all week gives people a greater opportunity to donate because there will always be someone around to accept donations. At least three brothers will be there at all times.

"Part of the idea is that we're out here fighting the elements. We hope people recognize that and give a little more," said Delloiacono.

To keep morale up, brothers stop by periodically to check up on each other.

"Guys drop off coffee to keep us warm," said Wilder Sucick.

Diamond also sees the camp-out as a way to promote a more positive image of fraternities on campus.

"It's setting a message to the campus that we're willing to stick it out in the cold for a good cause. It gives Greeks a good name, saying we're not just having parties but trying to better the community and the campus," said Diamond.

According to Delloiacono, this fundraiser is one of many that Sigma Phi Epsilon has done; he said each month the fraternity does community service. In addition to last year's camp-out, SigEp has raised money for Big Brothers, Big Sisters of Amherst; the Amherst Survival Center; Make a Wish Foundation; the American Cancer Society and have also done can drives and other charitable events.

"It gets the whole brotherhood together to do something good. We do a lot of good stuff," said Paul Ellis, a junior communications and English double major. "If people don't notice us now, they'll notice us in three days when we have icicles hanging off our faces."

Bush says he lacked information to prevent 9-11 attacks

By Hope Yen

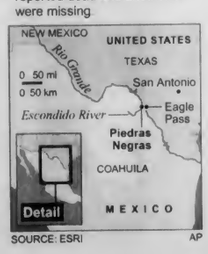
WASHINGTON (AP) — President Bush said yesterday he will tell the commission investigating the Sept. 11 attacks that his administration lacked the information needed to prevent the terrorists from striking.

The federal panel reviewing the attacks plans to meet soon with Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney in a joint private session to determine whether anything could have been done to stop the attacks.

A date for the meeting has been set but neither the commission nor the White House has disclosed it. Bush said he looks forward to "sharing information with them."

"Let me just be very clear about this," he said. "Had we had the information that was necessary to stop an attack, I'd have stopped the attack. ... If we'd have known that the enemy was going to fly airplanes into our buildings, we would have done everything in our power to stop it."



After the attacks, "this country immediately went on war footing and we went to war against al-Qaida. And we're going to keep after them until they are brought to justice and America is secure," Bush told reporters while on a trip to

Flash flood kills 25 in Mexican border city

Flood hits Mexico

A flash flood swept through Piedras Negras, Mexico, in Coahuila state. At least 21 were reported dead and another 60 were missing.

PIEDRAS NEGRAS, Mexico (AP) — Torrential rains swelled a tributary of the Rio Grande River by 25 feet early yesterday, causing a flash flood that inundated a Mexican border city, killing at least 25 people and forcing hundreds more into shelters. Dozens more people were missing; the death toll was expected to rise. Mexico declared a state of emergency in the area.

Floodwaters from the Escondido River began receding after the rain stopped by midday, but heavy, dark clouds loomed over Piedras Negras, a city of 200,000 people about 150 miles southwest of San Antonio.

Supplies of drinking water, electricity and gas were cut.

Hundreds of people were left homeless, radio stations reported, and announcers read the names of people staying at shelters to help families find missing relatives.

The heavy rains began Sunday and the downpours intensified around midnight, causing the river to overflow and flooding dozens of houses in a working-class area of tin-roof shacks within 15 minutes, city officials said.

"Houses were completely swept away. Cars flipped over, some on top of each other," said Marcela Aguirre, spokeswoman for the city in Coahuila state. "There is no power, no gas, no water."

At least 25 people were killed, said Coahuila state civil protection authority official Fernando Horta. More than half were elderly and two were children. Piedras Negras Red Cross president Alfonso Bres said.

Sixty people were reported missing, Bres said.

"Several senior citizens basically did not have the strength to resist," he said.

State authorities estimated that floodwaters destroyed or severely damaged at least 500 homes and 500 cars.

Mexico's Interior Department declared a state of emergency in the area, a declaration that releases federal funds to help the city rebuild.

Local factories offered shelter to their workers, radio stations reported. The population of Piedras Negras has swelled in recent years as residents from Mexico's interior arrived looking for factory work.

BACK TO OCTOBER

After debating with Hoeschele, Morrison sat down, having gotten Hoeschele to agree to amend the bylaws so that this would not be a problem.

Hoeschele did bring IRV to the Administrative Affairs committee in December. According to Bissonnette, Hoeschele and the Administrative Affairs committee decided that because the phrase "majority or plurality" had "or," IRV would not violate the Constitution. The Judiciary disagreed.

"In my opinion it is [constitutional]," Hoeschele said at the hearing. "When it came before the Administrative Affairs committee and they were very apprehensive about it. I withdrew it, and said, 'no, thanks.' I went ahead with it for this election, hoping that people would understand it and not be afraid of it."

The Elections Commission has the discretion to choose any method to run an election, according to the SGA Constitution.

Senator Craig Goldschmidt admitted, at last Wednesday's meeting, that Senators knew IRV was coming, but that no one wrote a motion to prevent Hoeschele from using it in the elections.

HOW IRV WORKS

Hoeschele, for his part, did go to several of those Administrative Affairs meetings to explain how IRV worked.

"It's as simple as that — one, two, three," said Peter Vickery to a small crowd on March 23, when explaining IRV. Vickery, a native of Wales now residing in Amherst, is the president of Fair Vote Mass, an organization dedicated to using IRV in Massachusetts.

Vickery spoke at an information session organized by Hoeschele to help educate a small group of student voters on IRV. During the session, Vickery explained how candidates are ranked to employ a run-off system instantly.

An IRV ballot works in this way: a voter ranks the candidates by preference, instead of only choosing one of multiple candidates. When the ballot is counted, all the first choice votes are counted first. If no one candidate achieves a majority (50 percent or more), then the candidate with the lowest amount of first choice votes is taken away. Those eliminated ballots' second choices are then counted as first choice votes and the totals are recalculated. This process continues until a candidate gets the majority.

Vickery used the 2000 National Presidential elections as an example of an election in which IRV would have made a critical difference. He explained that many Democrats complained that Green Party candidate Ralph Nader took away votes from the Democrats, allowing the Republicans to win. If IRV had been used, voters could have still have voted for Nader, but their second-choice candidate might have been Gore, allowing the Democrats to win.

On this year's ballot and in accompanying pamphlets, Hoeschele explained IRV, saying that it would guarantee a majority. However, the results showed that Bustamante actually won with 44.6 percent of the votes, a plurality but not a majority.

This result confused many SGA officials. Russell Plato, a former SGA official, said at the Judiciary hearings that he was confused why it came out as a plurality.

"As a member of the executive cabinet, I attended Administrative Affairs committees, had casual discussions with the Chancellor of Elections in the office, had casual discussions with the Attorney General, went to the Senate meetings where IRV was discussed ... a lawyer came into Administrative Affairs to explain how it worked," he said. "Based on all of those experiences, my understanding was that IRV had to produce an absolute majority."

Others have also expressed confusion. Tim Daly, governor of Southwest, told The Massachusetts Daily Collegian a story of how some people thought that the ranking system was a point system. The No. 1 choice would get three points, choice No. 2 would get two, and so on. However, this was not the case.

Part of the Judiciary's recommendations in its ruling states that not only would a constitutional amendment be necessary in regards to the "majority or plurality" clause, but so would a grant from the Massachusetts State Government "guaranteeing that every current student and all incoming student [sic] be educated on the format and counting procedures under the IRV method of election."

This is necessary because the Judiciary found that the confusion about IRV, as expressed by Plato and other officials at the hearing, had a "harmful effect," because the student body was not properly informed or educated on the format of the ballot, and this may have led to a significant effect on the vote or on the ability to vote.

The definition of "harmful effect" came from the 1998 Judiciary elections ruling. The current Judiciary attached the 1998 ruling to their ruling for 2004.

For the Senate's part, they chose not to ratify the elections based on what happened during the election process, not on IRV.

"Violations happen every year, but these seem to be a lot more egregious than they have been in the past," said former president Dave Carr.

Carr told The Collegian that violations included Berkshire Dining Common being closed both mornings, which, "is almost like not having California vote in the national election."

He also pointed to the trustee recount. When it was first counted, Carr won in the second round of voting by 10 votes. A recount was called, and Murphy won by 17. There was not a second recount.

"Plus, we didn't even have a system to have a recount," he said. "It's supposed to be something we have set up in a public meeting." The Senate echoed these complaints.

Senator Michael Sheridan, from Southwest South, where only six people voted because it was intended that they vote at Berkshire, was especially angry.

"I am going to stand for 3,000 Southwest South students and fight for their right to vote," he said. "This isn't the fault of the Senate. This is the fault of the Elections Commission. We need to place the blame where it belongs."

Carr agreed.

"This is by no fault of the people inside the SGA that this happened," he said. "This is something that the Elections Commission, which is almost a separate body, did on its own and they screwed this up for everyone else. Hopefully, this will bring out more people to vote because they see how close this is to a lot of people and how close it was in the second round."

Jared Nokes, former speaker of the Senate, is now the president as outlined by the Constitution when there is a vacancy in the presidential office. He sees his term as being on an interim-basis only.

"The important thing is we're going to continue as we were," he said. "The Judicial branch stepped in. They declared the elections to be invalid. I'm going to take over as president to fill a month period, then I'm going to step back down to being speaker and we're going to replace the speaker with somebody else and the system will continue working."

Bustamante, who won the elections with more than 300 votes, finds a lot of conflict of interest in what has gone on.

"I feel that there are tremendous conflicts of interest where people who were emotionally invested in campaigns are now making decisions not to ratify the elections by rationalizing technicalities," he said. "I don't think that anyone is doing anything they think is unjust in the end or they think is wrong for students ... It's just that there is so much influencing and clouding their vision."

These technicalities have thrown out elections before.

A PRECEDENT SET

In 1998, a more compounded set of problems devastated the first round of elections. The year 2004 has not seen the same depth of concerns.

On the initial ballot set for March 9 and 10, 12 candidates were officially in the race. Yet, the night before elections, three of those candidates were removed from the ballot. Dan Parker, candidate for president, and Erik Hansen, candidate for trustee, were removed from the election based on allegations that their campaign signs had covered those of other candidates.

Neither candidate was present at the 9 p.m. hearing, and later claimed that neither knew of the hearing. They also claimed that they had no help posting flyers, but did not commit these acts themselves.

"I know I didn't put any of our flyers over anyone else's and I didn't tear any down. Dan gave me his word that he didn't know either," Hanson told The Collegian.

Jenn Casasanto, a candidate for president, was also taken off the ballot for illegal flyer posting, as well as acquiring illegal campaign funding.

Eleanor Court, an ALANA (African, Latino, Asian and Native American) Caucus member who would later go on to win the final election, claimed that Casasanto's running mate, the trustee at the time, had put in nomination forms just to give money to Casasanto.

"I said, 'So you're going to put your name on the poster to get the money for Jenn, then drop out?' He said yeah, and he was kind of laughing like it was a joke," Court told the Elections Commission in 1998.

Casasanto fired back with allegations against Amy Pellegrino, providing film with supposed pictures of students tearing down Casanto's flyers. This film was developed that night at 12:30 a.m. By the next morning, the photographs did not show any evidence to support Casasanto's claim.

The elections went on with Pellegrino wining the presidency and Court wining the trustee position. However, because of the confusion over whose name should appear on the ballot, two other candidates' names were crossed out by accident during the polling at Franklin Dining Commons. Also, there were claims that some Dining Commons were not fully open, and absentee ballots were not available everywhere.

Carlos Alvarez, the chancellor of elections in 1998, felt that overall, despite these infractions, the elections were successful.

However, Alvarez did not deliver the Senate the elections report, which is needed for the Senate to ratify elections. He also resigned because his Elections Commission felt that the report Alvarez had written was insufficient.

"My purpose [for not filing the report] is to avoid annulling the elections. If these elections are not ratified there will not be new elections until next year," Alvarez told The Collegian.

This action left the Senate confused because nothing in the Constitution or bylaws explained what should happen if no election report is filed. Counsel Charles DiMare, who was counsel in both the 1998 and 2004 elections, offered advice to the Senate.

He said that the Senate should not ratify the results because of the lack of absentee ballots. Students could sue if they felt they were not given the chance to vote.

"I think they would win. If 10 people stood up and said I couldn't vote because there weren't any absentee ballots, that would be overwhelming evidence if it is believed," DiMare told the Senate.

On April 1, the Senate did ratify the elections, leaving it for the Judiciary to figure out its constitutionality. On April 14, the Judiciary ruled the elections null, mainly due to the "harmful effect" on the vote caused by all the mistakes, especially the lack of absentee ballots.

In the meantime, Peter Killbourne, then speaker of the senate, became president. Some Senators at the time remarked on the precedent this ruling set.

"It creates a loophole for the candidates that lose in the future," Senator Jeffrey Howe told The Collegian in 1998. "The precedent that has been set is that every future election will have to be run specifically by the Constitution, and the way the Constitution is written, it is impossible."

The 2004 Judiciary used the "harmful effect" definition that the Judiciary in 1998 defined, in relation to the use and confusion over IRV.

The elections were redone, nearly a month and a half later, on April 29 and 30. The invalidated candidates could run again, although only six of the 12 did.

They were not completely smooth the second time, either. Salwa Shamapande, and running mate Court, reported a break-in to the Radical Student Union, their campaign headquarters, supposedly by Pellegrino. The Elections Commission could not rule on this because it was brought to the Dean of Students office and Pellegrino was on the second ballot.

However, Shamapande and Court did go on to win, with both getting about 59 percent of the vote. Three hundred more students voted the second time. Seth Presser, the new chancellor of elections, noted that 288 of those were done by absentee ballots.

Bank of America says it will cut 12,500 jobs

CHARLOTTE, N.C. (AP) — Bank of America Corp. announced yesterday it is cutting 12,500 jobs over the next two years as a result of its merger with FleetBoston Financial Corp.

The cuts, which represent about 7 percent of the companies' combined work force of 181,000, will begin this month. About 30 percent of them will be accomplished through attrition.

The Charlotte-based bank has said it expects to get about $650 million in savings from trimming overlapping operations and processes.

Several workers leaving Bank of America's headquarters in downtown Charlotte yesterday evening were not aware of the company's plans. Loan officer Veronica Dawkins said she had not received any word from the company.

"There's been a lot of talk around the office, but no one has given me any indication whatsoever that I need to worry," Dawkins said. "I'm hoping it works out for everybody."

Spokeswoman Eloise Hale would not specify where positions would be eliminated, saying only that they will take place "corporation-wide."

The completion last week of Bank of America's merger with Fleet created the nation's No. 3 bank, with assets estimated at $966 billion. As part of its merger agreement, the company committed to maintain overall employment levels in New England.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Federal aid for poor students to decrease

WASHINGTON (AP) — Eleven states will get less federal money for poor students next school year, while the 39 other states and the District of Columbia will get more, new figures show.

The dollar changes come about for two reasons: the use of new estimates of where poor students live, and overall spending increases in the federal aid program known as Title I.

Under law, the Education Department is supposed to use the most current, reliable population data available in determining how to distribute more than $12 billion. So the agency has plugged in census data released last year, reflecting family incomes in 2000.

Lawmakers in some states have objected, saying that the estimates don't accurately reflect their school districts, and that poor schools will suffer as demands on them grow. Senators of both parties have asked the department to reconsider. It does not plan to do so.

"We have not heard from anyone who has provided a substantive explanation for why the numbers shouldn't be adopted," Todd Jones, a department budget official, said yesterday.

The eleven states that will get less money are Kansas, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Dakota, Ohio and Pennsylvania, based on preliminary estimates. The final spending numbers are expected within a few weeks.

Within all states, some school districts will gain federal money and some will lose, as intended to reflect shifts in population. But fewer districts would take such a big hit if the Bush administration had met its promise to help needy schools, said Judd Legum, deputy research director at the Center for American Progress, a Democrat-affiliated think tank.

Federal spending on Title I hit a record $12.3 billion for the next school year, up more than $650 million in one year. But $18.5 billion was authorized under Bush's education law.

Los Angeles Times takes home five Pulitzer prizes

NEW YORK (AP) —The Los Angeles Times was awarded five Pulitzer Prizes on April 5 for coverage ranging from devastating wildfires in its backyard to a civil war on the other side of the globe — the second-most awards ever won by a newspaper.

NAMY HUSS/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Los Angeles Times photographer Carolyn Cole hugs Nicolai Ouroussoff after she won a Pulitzer Prize.

Coverage of the war in Iraq led to two prizes: Anthony Shadid of The Washington Post for international reporting, and David Leeson and Cheryl Diaz Meyer of The Dallas Morning News for breaking news photography.

The New York Times won the public service award for a story by David Barstow and Lowell Bergman about worker safety at a company where lax enforcement allegedly contributed to thousands of injuries and some deaths. The Wall Street Journal claimed a pair of Pulitzers: one for explanatory reporting and a second for beat reporting.

As news of the Pulitzers reached the Los Angeles Times' newsroom, staff members erupted in cheers and applause.

"My feeling is this reflects the depth of talent at this paper and the depth of dedication across all departments," Times editor John S. Carroll told the staff.

The newspaper's five prizes were exceeded only by The New York Times' seven awards in 2002 — most of those related to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. Prior to that, no publication had ever won more than three Pulitzers in a single year.

The Los Angeles Times won Pulitzers in criticism, editorial writing, feature photography, breaking news and national reporting.

The Times staff was recognized for breaking news coverage of the wildfires that tore through Southern California last fall, killing 24 people, destroying thousands of homes and charring more than 750,000 acres.

Dan Neil, who joined the newspaper in September, won the criticism award for what the Pulitzer board described as "one-of-a-kind reviews of automobiles." William Stall won for his editorials analyzing the state's troubled government and offering remedies.

Powell assures US support

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti (AP) — Secretary of State Colin Powell gave assurances yesterday of full U.S. support for Haiti's interim government but said democracy cannot flourish until politically motivated private armies lay down their weapons.

"Without disarmament, Haiti's democracy will be at risk," Powell said at a news conference with Haiti's interim prime minister, Gerard Latortue. Latortue told Powell that all of Haiti's political parties agree that municipal, legislative and presidential elections should be held in 2005.

Powell said prospects are good for sending a U.N.-sponsored peacekeeping force to replace the U.S.-led multinational force that arrived shortly after the Feb. 29 departure of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide.

IRAQ

Warrant out for Shiite cleric

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — U.S. administrators in Iraq declared a radical Shiite cleric an "outlaw" yesterday and announced a warrant for his arrest, heightening a confrontation after battles between his supporters and coalition troops killed at least 52 Iraqis and nine coalition troops, including eight Americans.

American officials would not say when they would move to arrest Muqtada al-Sadr, who is holed up in the main mosque in Kufa, south of Baghdad, guarded by armed supporters.

L. Paul Bremer, the top U.S. official in Iraq, cancelled a trip to Washington this week, a Senate aide said yesterday. The aide said Bremer was to have given a closed-door briefing Thursday to the full Senate on the situation in Iraq, but Senate officials were informed yesterday morning that the visit to Washington had been put off. No reason was given for the postponement, the aide said.

U.S. troops surrounded the city of Fallujah, west of Baghdad, poised for a major operation in response to the grisly slaying and mutilation of four American civilians by insurgents there last week.

SPAIN

One arrested for bombings

MADRID, Spain (AP) — Authorities announced another arrest in the Madrid terror bombings yesterday and sent police to patrol subway and bus stations, as a newspaper said a group linked to al-Qaida threatened to turn Spain into "an inferno."

Court officials said the arrest came Saturday in Ceuta, a Spanish enclave on the Moroccan coast. No details were given on the man's identity or possible role in the March 11 train attacks, which killed 191 people. Another suspect whose weekend arrest was also announced yesterday has been released after questioning, officials said.

The arrest raises to 16 the number of people in custody, including six charged with mass murder.

Interior Minister Angel Acebes confirmed yesterday that one of those killed in a suicide blast Saturday in an apartment south of Madrid was Moroccan Jamal Ahmidan, a prime suspect in the bombings.

Bush lacked information

North Carolina.

Bush also said National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice "knows exactly what took place and will lay out the facts" when she testifies Thursday before the 10-member bipartisan panel. "I'm looking forward to people hearing her," he said.

Rice's testimony was assured only after Bush changed course last week under pressure and decided to allow her to appear publicly and under oath. She met privately with the commission in February.

The Bush administration had been uneasy that allowing a top aide to testify could set a precedent of summoning top aides before a congressional panel to provide sworn testimony. Such a move would inhibit the willingness of aides to provide the president with candid advice.

Commission spokesman Al Felzenberg said yesterday the decision to let Rice testify might have been influenced by a 1945 photo the panel sent to the White House showing a top presidential aide appearing before a congressional panel to discuss policy advice.

The Nov. 22, 1945, New York Times photograph shows Adm. William D. Leahy, chief of staff to Presidents Franklin Roosevelt and Harry Truman, appearing before the special congressional panel investigating the Pearl Harbor attacks.

Felzenberg said the commission's executive director, Philip Zelikow, faxed the photo the day before the White House reversed its position, showing the administration there was historical support for allowing a top presidential aide to testify under oath before a congressional panel.

"It deals with the historical precedent which the White House and we were concerned about," Felzenberg said. "You won't find a clearer case."

Action needed to repair UMass campus

It's an all too familiar site for residents on this campus: areas that are in desperate need of repair and maintenance. Leaking walls in the library, roads checkered by potholes, the deteriorating Old Chapel that's been closed off because of old age and outdated classrooms are just some of the eyesores that plague the University. The list seems almost endless.

That's why Chancellor John V. Lombardi has proposed his $430 million spending package to repair, renovate and construct new buildings in what can be described as a university in danger of seeing its reputation crumble along with its age-old buildings.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian expressed its support for Lombardi's plan nearly six weeks ago, shortly after the announcement of his proposal. Since then, however, the issue has become even more pressing.

Other organizations are also starting to get wind of the proposed changes for UMass. Yesterday, The Boston Globe ran a front-page story, complete with picture, titled, "Campus in decay." The article, while focusing on the ideas behind the renovation plan, portrayed our campus in an extremely negative light.

"Leaking roofs and chipped floor tiles compete with more serious problems, such as faulty elevators and the asbestos that shut down one old housing complex," wrote Globe staff writer Jenna Russell.

While all of us are well aware of the maintenance problems at our school, we certainly don't want to gain a reputation for it throughout the state. Especially at this time of year, many high school seniors, after reading the Globe article, may decide that UMass is not worth their time or money.

As state funding has been declining over the past few years, the University has spent its limited funds to avoid layoffs, retain top professors and maintain as many classes as possible. And despite dramatic increases in tuition prices, the money was not enough to offset the cost of declining funding from the recession. Renovations and repairs were one of the last concerns of the University.

Now, however, the University needs to make a change in its priorities. Continuing to delay maintenance will only lead to bigger problems in the future, including the loss of top professors and failure to attract excellent students.

Repairs and renovations are more important than simply aesthetics. It's unfair for professors to teach with projectors that have holes in them, for students to sit in wobbly chairs, for science students to use outdated lab spaces. Renovations can also prove to be environmentally and economically efficient. Many buildings on campus have poor climate control, forcing students and faculty to open windows during the winter months.

The problem has been put off long enough; it's time the University and the state take action now. Hopefully, if the state of disrepair on our campus continues to attract media attention from organizations such as The Globe, it will push our legislators into action as they realize that our reputation as a state university is on the line.

Education under occupation

Asif Khan

Daily, the commands of Israeli soldiers at the notorious Surdah checkpoint on the Ramallah-Birzeit road in the occupied territories in Palestine prevent Birzeit University faculty and students from reaching the university to continue their education and research.

Maher, a 22 year-old, lives in Ramallah and is a student majoring in sociology at Birzeit University. He had hoped to graduate in June 2002 but with the closure on the university, he has no idea when he will be able to return to classes and finish the semester. Since the Israeli invasion of Ramallah in late March 2002, Maher says he avoids crossing the checkpoint on the way to Birzeit as much as possible. Once soldiers held him at the checkpoint for more than three hours. Another time he was accompanying a female colleague of his when they were stopped by soldiers, who upon searching her bag found some sanitary towels. One of the soldiers took them out and started waving them around in front of the other soldiers and pedestrians. His friend was so embarrassed that she began to cry. Maher felt so humiliated, and since then he hates making the long and arduous trip to the university.

These stories are from just one of the students of Birzeit University on the West Bank in Palestine. The university is one of the premier higher learning institutions in Palestine currently educating over 6,300 students from Palestine as well as students from other countries. Since 2000, 194 students have been killed. 1,294 injured and 710 detained, mostly in peaceful demonstrations against the illegal Israeli occupation of the West Bank.

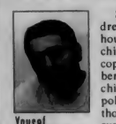
I recently attended a talk at Smith College by two graduates of Birzeit University, Reem Wadan and Yasser Darwish. Their experience shocked me beyond belief. Here at UMass we complain about walking from Southwest to Totman Gymnasium for a class. Students who attend Birzeit have to walk anywhere from one to five miles every morning to go to class. During this long trek they encounter several checkpoints, a number of which will make them turn back and miss that day or week or year's classes.

A number of checkpoints all over the occupied territories have armed soldiers who stop every man, woman and child crossing over. According to Darwesh, the soldiers have been known to ask people to imitate animals and/or take all their clothes off; failure to do so results in severe physical punishment and/or detention.

The Universal Declaration of Human Rights states that, "Everyone has the right to education." But since 1987, education for Palestinians in the occupied territories has been deemed as "illegal" by the Israeli government.

Wadan related her experience from when she was 7 years old. In order to get an education, she and her friends had to hide from the Israeli soldiers to attend secret community schools with closed windows because they were in violation of the Israeli rules. 1,289 schools have been closed by the Israeli army since the first Intifada: 38 schools in Jenin, Bethlehem, Qalqilia and Tulkarem were closed more recently when the building of the "security fence" started.

The number of children detained is also shocking: 2,000 since the first Intifada. 307 of whom are still in prison today. A majority of these children suffer diseases like cancer, asthma and arthritis; most have been victims of extreme torture. Any form of treatment has yet to be given to them.



Even though the conditions in this region look almost completely hopeless, these people have still not lost hope and still believe that "education is the best way to rise above this precarious situation they find themselves in."

How can Israel, a state that claims to be the freest country in the Middle East, the "one true democracy" with rights for all people, stand by and watch people live and die like this as a result of its actions?

Those interested in supporting the campaign for the right of Palestinians to get an education can go to http://right2edu.birzeit.edu/ for more information.

Some children play house. Some children play cops and robbers. Some children play politics, and those children run the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association.

With every day that goes by, the SGA loses credibility with students. Last week's events only perpetuated that feeling. The fact of the matter is, an election in which each candidate had an equal opportunity of winning was held. Twenty-four members of the student senate chose not to accept that. Twenty-four members of the student senate chose not accept the votes of their constituents. Twenty-four members of the student senate chose to silence 2,800 students and put into power a man who received one vote.

Senate meetings should take place under a big, colorful tent. At least that way, students will know where to find the circus.

Instant Runoff Voting (IRV) was a big issue this year. I do not think this is the best system to use, but the elections commission did. I couldn't believe I heard senators argue that the ballot was confusing. What's wrong with you people? Are you 87 year-old senile citizens from Dade County, Florida? No, you are college students. Read the directions and vote; it's that simple. Just because some people are ignorant doesn't mean an election should be thrown out.

No SGA election is going to be flawless. Every SGA election I can remember has been flawed or controversial. This time it was taken to another level, partly because of who won. Title VIII of the SGA bylaws deals with elections. It is absolutely flawed. The entire system is flawed. I have been saying this since I encountered Title VIII last year. This is the senate's fault, particularly this year. Every year elections commissioners have to be appointed and approved by the senate. This is a process that is done with little care.

I can tell you from being approved by the senate before that the process is quite ridiculous. When I was confirmed as chancellor of elections last year, I was openly attacked for being a rapist sympathizer. A student with a personal agenda took a column I wrote about how security at UMass needs to be improved, calling on administration officials to do more for student safety. This person then misconstrued it by reading sentences out of context to paint me as an evil, rape-condoning person. Almost half of the room believed those lies. At that point, I knew the SGA didn't care about students' interests and was too concerned with internal "politics."

Senate meetings should take place under a big, colorful tent. At least that way, students will know where to find the circus.

When inevitable election problems occur the senate is ready to blame the elections commission for not doing the job right. They completely neglect the fact that they are responsible for the elections commission and that they are responsible for the failure of the elections. If the elections commission does not do its job right, the senate, which approved the commission for the job, is to blame.

No one will really realize how flawed Title VIII is until they try to run an election. The title gives responsibilities to one person and a commission that they cannot pull off. The title gives no power for the chancellor of elections to enforce the title. In fact in many instances, the chancellor has to act alone because the commission is apathetic. The commission is apathetic because they don't really want to be there. All of this goes back to the senate.

The senators from Southwest South who thought they were being true to their constituents by not ratifying elections were absolutely wrong. They in fact went against all of their constituents because many of them did vote. All of them had an opportunity to vote. Just because a polling station was closed doesn't mean they couldn't vote at any other station. The senators from Southwest South who voted against ratification because a polling station was closed effectually told their constituents that inconvenience was a reason to neglect civic duty. The senators effectively oppose everything this nation stands for and have perpetuated apathy and denigrated the duty of voting. The senators should resign.

I haven't even begun to tell you about the Grinch who stole elections, Jared Nokes. I told Jared that I have no problem with him personally, but we have to be honest here, the conflict of interests is simply incriminating. If Nokes was smart and honestly did have every intention of becoming president, he shouldn't have made it so blatantly obvious.

What this all comes down to is that the SGA, specifically the student senate, is incapable of doing its job. They are too busy with the internal nonsense that they have not only forgotten that they are working for the students, but that they themselves are students too. If this continues, the SGA should be disbanded because their inability to operate is insulting to the students who pay for them.

New elections will be held, and make no mistake they will be flawed as well. Still, someone has to be elected. It time the students will elect someone who is going to bring change to this flawed system, even if they have to be elected a second time.

The truth about booing

Zach Oelschlegel

You know those twerps who can't score a goal on Mr. Slice during the second Intermission at hockey games? I boo them. When a 6-year-old is hailed as the fan of the game twenty minutes later? I boo that kid too.

Yeah, yeah, tell me that they're just kids, and I should cut it out because they're trying their hardest to score those goals on Mr. Slice, and boy, are they ever cute. My friend Neil tells me so.

"Zach, that kid was younger than my sister!"

So what? If Tom Brady dressed up in a tutu and went 10 for 30 with three interceptions, would you cheer him on because he looked cute? Booing isn't so much of an unintelligent insult as it is making a truthful statement. Furthermore, athletes take it completely the wrong way when they are justifiably booed, and forget how blessed they are to have fans that care enough to tell them they should be doing better.

People shouldn't always have to sweeten things up and make euphemisms for something that isn't quality.

As I have lived in Philadelphia for all twenty years of my life (yes, the truth comes out), booing is in my blood. I was there at Veterans Stadium when we booed J.D. Drew to oblivion, and even threw his foul balls back onto the field (the people over at Wrigley must have liked that one). I appreciate the utter contempt the Red Sox nation has for Derek Jeter when he comes to Fenway because he too deserves to be booed. Most of all, I smile when I read stories about athletes being booed, and am really proud when I read that it's coming from my home city.

Booing is one of the more unappreciated things in sports these days. People look with scorn at the fans of cities that aren't afraid to tell their athletes that things aren't going so well. Announcers are hasty to make judgments about fans when a team is having a bad game and the fans are telling them about it. They see it a sign of disrespect, and that it's not going to help the team at all.

Chris Webber, a basketball player more renowned for his being a total loser than a fantastic athlete, has of late been whining about the Sacramento faithful booing him after having a few bad games. ESPN.com reported that, "people close to Webber said he has already vented to some friends and family members about not wanting to continue to have to sing for his supper every night, not knowing how he will be received at each game."

I would simply tell Webber to toughen up. He should be so lucky to have fans that care enough about winning that they pack the house every game. After shooting a horrendous average from the floor and not playing like he should, why should Webber expect the cheers and radiance that come with excellence? I bet there are players from the Atlanta Hawks or New Orleans Hornets who would absolutely kill for a fan base that cared enough to boo them. When will athletes stop looking at the boo as a blatant insult and start realizing that their fans want to win just as much as they do?

The simple reason why a fan boos his home team is because he knows they are capable of doing better. In fact, all he wants is for the team to do better, and one should be allowed to tell it like it is in the professional sports scene. Why do announcers make it out to be that the fan loves booing more than he loves winning?

I don't understand the mentality an athlete has. He makes millions of dollars, is superficially admired for everything he does, yet, a simple taunt or boo can bruise his ego to no end. Do athletes live by a standard of eternal glory? Why can't they look at their crowd booing them in the same way I take criticism for my English papers?

People shouldn't always have to sweeten things up and make euphemisms for something that isn't quality. Unless Webber is consistently playing up to his potential and helping the team instead of hurting it, I will boo and heckle him. I have no shame. People in America sneer at Simon Cowell because he tells those wanna-be American Idols that they haven't got it. Fans shouldn't be afraid to tell their favorite athlete that he hasn't got it, either.

As for myself, I still reserve the right to chuckle at that fifth-grader from Amherst Elementary because he can't make a shot against a man dressed as a ridiculously oversized slice of pizza.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

OIT DEFENDS ITS EMPLOYEES

I am the manager of the Office of Informational Technologies Software Support. I write in response to the column by Molly Eggleston titled, "My computer, the hostage." The lamentable events that she describes are true. The characterizations and generalizations she made about OIT and its employees are not.

Everyone that read her column, I'm sure, can understand her frustration. Personally, I feel terrible about it. Over the years that I have worked for OIT, we have had our share of successes, and some failures as well. And there have been one or two times that I felt we truly let someone down and had no excuse. Molly's case is one of them.

What I find hard to swallow is her demeaning character attacks of OIT personnel as incompetent, uncaring, or worse. The many people in various departments within OIT are smart and well-educated, who routinely go above and beyond the call of duty to help people. The job being done on a daily basis by the students who work in Software Support is nothing short of amazing. It goes way beyond the pale of a typical student job.

The responsibility for what happened to Molly's computer is mine. It is not the fault of the many other people in the many other departments of OIT, and to characterize them all that way is unjustified and irresponsible.

STUDENT RALLIES SUPPORT FOR BUSTAMANTE AND MURPHY

On April 1, a grave injustice was committed by the Student Government Association. Jared Nokes is now the president of the SGA after receiving a total of one vote in the last round of elections. This is in sharp contrast to Eddie Bustamante, who received a total of 1,200 votes.

On March 24 and 25, the UMass student body went to the polls and spoke in favor of Eddie Bustamante for SGA president and Matthew Murphy for trustee. Bustamante won by 300 votes while Murphy won by a margin of 17. These numbers reflect the election results with the Instant Runoff Voting (IRV) deemed valid. However, if the IRV is not counted, Bustamante won by 450 votes while Murphy won by 120. Without a doubt, the UMass student body was united in its choice.

At Wednesday's SGA meeting, the vote to ratify the elections was defeated by a vote of 24-21. On Wednesday, 24 democratically elected senators decided that the voice of the UMass student body does not count.

Currently, they are planning on holding a "new election" on April 28 and 29. The last one cost the student body a total of $5,000. Now, these senators have voted to tax the students an extra $5,000, which is enough money to fully fund eight RSO's for one year. Instead, this money will be used to undermine a democratically elected ticket.

This is your money and your voice that is being silenced; this is a slap in your face. It's time that these tyrannical SGA members accept the voices of the 2,788 students that voted. What occurred at the meeting is illegal, undemocratic and unconstitutional. Eddie Bustamante and Matthew Murphy are the democratically elected officials of the student body, and the SGA needs to recognize that. There should not be another election; it is too costly for a student body that has already spoken.

However, if the students need to come out and speak with a united voice once again in the face tyranny and repression, they will. I urge all of you to stay informed on these proceedings and hold the SGA accountable for their actions. The next meeting will be Wednesday, April 7, at 6:45 p.m. in the Campus Center. Please show up and support Bustamante and Murphy.

Ghostface grows up

Rapper Ghostface Killah reflects on his 10 years in the hip-hop industry after Wednesday's show at UMass

By Monique Jemmott
Collegian Staff

In the fast paced world of hip-hop, Ghostface Killah proves that he is trying to keep a level head amongst it all.

Longevity is not a word that is often associated with the rap industry. Artists come a dime a dozen, and trends are forever changing, forcing artists who want a fighting chance at extending their 15 minutes of fame to change with it. So to have an artist boast 10 years plus in the hip-hop game is not only rare, but interesting and intriguing at the same time. Ghostface Killah — also known as Tony Starks, also known as Pretty Tony — has won the bragging rights to this feat. Since his debut in 1993 on the Wu-Tang Clan's "Enter the Wu (36 chambers)" and with the April 20 release date of his new album "Pretty Tony" approaching, Ghost has proven himself a force in the rap game.

Upon meeting Ghost, it is difficult to write this man off as anything other than intense and serious about what he does. Being in his presence it becomes very clear why he has achieved the success that he has in this industry.

"I'm just trying to keep hip-hop intact," said the rapper in an interview following his performance on Wednesday at the University of Massachusetts. "Hip-hop is lost right now; people are all into this commercial shit and the young ones are being raised on what hip-hop used to be," Ghost said. "I remember a time when hip-hop was real fly, the days when rappers were original."

And it seems that Mr. Face himself has chosen to take the stance of hip-hop diplomat when it comes to operating in the game. "Hip-hop is always gonna change, that's just hip-hop," he said, "and all I can do is be me." Ghostface Killah remains dedicated to making hip-hop that matters.

"My music will stay the same, I'm consistent. I still got my soul shit in there, and that's just me," he said. "My style is consistent, but I'm still gonna grow, and even when I do I'm still gonna be Ghost."

To see evidence of what Ghostface feels has been his growth in the past ten years, you need only look to the albums he has made. "You can look at my music to see how I've grown," he said. "I've been consistent from Iron Man [released in 1996] to Supreme Clientele [released in 2000] and straight through to Bulletproof Wallets [released in 2001]," he said.

Yet his music is not the only place that Ghost has sought to grow.

"You can also look back on past interviews, the way I present myself is completely different, because the way I think of myself is different," he said. "I've grown throughout the years ... I had to. These are signs of becoming a man ... It's about growth and development."

When asked about The Wu-Tang Clan and how his growth as an artist affected relationships amongst him and the group members, Ghost seemed to find the maturity a strengthening factor.

"Shit between us is real. There are a few members that have fallen to the wayside, but a few of us keep in contact," he said. "I speak to RZA; I just spoke to [Method Man] and I just spoke to [Inspectah] Deck. We got plans to put out a new Wu album in 2005, so everything between us is straight for the most part."

Despite all of the knowledge that he has picked up along the road, it still has not hit him that he is a part of hip-hop history.

"When people ask me how it feels to be apart of one of the best rap groups of all times, I don't really know how to answer them because I'm in the mix of it all," Ghost said. "But maybe 20 years down the line I'll be like 'damn, I was really part of that?'"

"But it's all a blessing" he added humbly. "I give thanks to the Father everyday for letting it be."

It seems that the Billboard-topping artist has got it all figured out. He has mastered the art of staying in the game, as well as keeping himself intact. And he has done it all without going into overdrive, but there are some things that even Ghostface is struggling to understand.

"I wish the world were a lot better place because right now it's real fed up," Ghost said, in response to what has been bothering him recently. "But I'm doing whatever I got to do to make things happen for the babies and the people that are starving."

For his part, Ghost is looking to his music and personal maturity to affect some change.

"I'm older now and I feel like I've had my time, my focus now is on the younger generation, and how I can make shit better for them." Among the changes he is seeking to make is a current project for building a school in South Africa.

"God gave me opportunities in rap as my instrument for change," he said, "and I'm just trying to see what I can do to make things happen within my reach."

"We got to learn as black people to share our resources. That's the problem; we got all this money, and power and don't know what to do with it," he said. For the conscientious rapper, community building is high on his list of priorities. "I don't need $100 million to be happy, I just need enough to be comfortable and the rest can be used to help those who ain't got it. You got your Bill Cosbys and your Oprah Winfreys, but we need more people like us, just straight hood to do these same things."

Spoken like a true veteran of the game.

Ghostface Killah performed at the Student Union Ballroom Wednesday along with hip-hoppers Joe Budden, XL and Mass State Committee.

Third time's a charm for Bonnaroo Festival

Put your imagination to work: assemble a 'who's who' of talent from any crevice or plateau adorning today's musical landscape. Next, allot them three days and 700 acres to perform, cavort and collaborate on a farm in Tennessee where, amidst the torrid summer heat, you could lay your worries down far from where you laid your tent.

Sound too good to be true? Hardly. The third annual Bonnaroo Music Festival will lay its stake in the history of sound June 11, 12 and 13. Past performers include Neil Young, James Brown, Ben Harper, Jurassic 5 and Norah Jones; names like these might have passed you a hint as to what's going down this summer.

And what's going down is hot: Dave Matthews & Friends, Bob Dylan, The Dead, Primus, Trey Anastasio, Ani Difranco, Los Lobos, Guster and String Cheese Incident, plus dozens more, will take the stage in Manchester, Tenn. to the delight of fans as varied as the artists performing.

Varied is an understatement. At Bonnaroo 2004, an eclectic plate of sumptuous sounds will be served to those in attendance: fans with a taste for a little bit of everything. The jazzheads can kick it to the percolating rhythms of Medeski, Martin & Wood. Soulive or The Bad Plus while the jammers can get to the tweaked-out rock of moe., String Cheese Incident or Umphrey's McGee. Likewise, the world-beat fiends can get their fix with Femi Kuti or Trey Anastasio's group while the classic rockers dig on Dylan, The Dead or Willie Nelson. There's something for everyone at Bonnaroo; ask any distinguished member of last year's 80,000 plus crowd.

Or save yourself the trouble of actual human contact: ask Rolling Stone what they thought. "Bonnaroo 2003 was the American music festival to end all festivals," read an article in last July's issue. "And maybe the most eclectic hodge-podge of music ever packed into a single weekend."

Recent additions to the artist line-up include funky gospel-rockers Robert Randolph & the Family Band — currently on tour with Eric Clapton, — legendary folkie Doc Watson, and latin jazzbos Marc Ribot y Los Cubanos Postizos. So what are you waiting for? Organize a pilgrimage to Manchester, Tenn. before time runs out. Three-day passes are $164.50 at www.Bonnaroo.com.

Read Yellow makes UMass proud

Read Yellow
"Radios Burn Faster"
Fenway

On "Radios Burn Faster" Read Yellow's sound evolves impressively. The band got their start during their days as UMass students.

By Timothy Gabriele
Collegian Staff

A bunch of UMass kids made an album.

"So what?" you ask. "Plenty of subpar UMass bands go out and cut albums with money they scrounged together from long, thankless nights at Big Y. What's the difference with this one?"

The difference is that beyond the fact that Read Yellow have recorded a John Peel session, been picked up by Krist Novoselic, received single of the week in London's The Independent, received minor airplay on MTV2 and had praises serenaded upon them by the NME, Read Yellow actually have the wares to back up these claims to fame. Having landed coveted opening slots for practically every "It" band in the indie phone book, Read Yellow's destructive sideshow performances have shuddered the backbones of music lovers and created murmurs of desperation from struggling locals unable to conjure how a bunch of state school brats could manage to, mostly by chance, wind up in the middle of an exploding new music scene.

Watching Read Yellow — formerly known as the Sharks! before being sued by, of all people, Bill Paxton's band — ecstatically ignite into thunderous punk rock swagger last year at basement shows in Van Meter, was an exhilarating experience with all sorts of unexpected outcomes. The only concern for those shows cut short by broken noses and smashed instruments was the fear that Read Yellow would overdose on rock n' roll excess before they ever even got a chance to become rock stars. Loyal friends with screenprinted fan shirts that read, "We want the ShARKS," announced their arrival like a plague of SARS ready to sweep the campus and the earth. Jealous bands still whining about their overnight success might want to latch onto UMass' 21st century Pixies, instead of complaining. To say that Amherst could become the next Seattle may be a pipe dream, but Read Yellow's energy seems to be spreading.

Perhaps the hype is a bit premature. This "Making the Band" episode is far from over and lead vocalist Evan Kenney is no Frank Black or Kurt Cobain yet. There's still much to be desired on "Radios Burn Faster." However, to say that what exists on the album does not distinguish itself from its peers is negligent and wrong. Several reviews have accused the band of tilling the musical landscape for pieces of "Fugazi," "And You Will Know Us By the Trail of the Dead," "Sonic Youth," and "At the Drive In."

What these critics fail to realize is that none of these influences even remotely sound like each other, and that combining one's predecessors with dignity lies at the foundation of every good band. If Nirvana had not plucked a guitar line from the Pixies over a decade ago, the same critics would still be reviewing crusty, hackneyed White Lion releases.

For those that missed their debut EP, Read Yellow have rerecorded those four songs with the help of veteran producer Paul Kolderie for their first full length. The album kicks into the motion with a newly modeled version of "The Association." Driven by ambulance guitars, there is not much deference from the energy and intent of the original. As a single, it is fierce and immediate, taught and roaring. Kenney cries in desperation towards the song's end, "Will you follow me home?/ Will you swallow me whole?" The emotion is acute and resonant thanks to the carefully fed-back drones and buildups that have preceded it. The lyrics are much more ambivalent. As the words lead us from the woods to the road to the sea, one wonders: could they be referring to a brutal rape, a stinging love affair or just the more abstract notion of a negative association haunting a young mod boy?

The disconnection in some of the lyrics is not really a major distraction or retraction from the overall enjoyment of the album. The nucleus of Read Yellow's biggest hang-up comes moments before that cathartic howl at the end of "The Association." The breakdown of the song lays semi-spoken word atop a mellower bridge in a way that recalls ATDI's "Invalid Litter Dept." There's nothing wrong with this per sé, but the technique has become so cliché in the modern post-hardcore world that it's hard to imagine a band like Read Yellow making a full album without the aforementioned spoken word breakdown.

In addition, other gimmicks pop up throughout the album. Fist-waving chants recycled from the hardcore scene and singalongs carry an irritating charm that at times tries to reinforce the melodicism in what are already quite catchy songs. It's what is probably most likely to attract genre fans and perhaps even invite radio friendships, but there's a compromising angle to employing such tricks that must be carefully avoided. Read Yellow do — half of the time. On the other half, it's rarely a big enough problem to dismiss the holistic swelter of their mammoth compositions.

The most radical change of the four revised EP tracks is the fresh version of "Fashion Fatale," which replaces the walkie-talkie vocals with a crisper session and fattens the guitars a bit. The result deviates from a "Hate to Say I Told You So" romp to a gluttonously good hair-guitar rock. Like Rye Coalition's recent "Jersey Girls" EP, the song seems both reverent to its AC/DC roots and self-aware of the absurdity of holding reverence to AC/DC. The track, fueled by dizzying sex, is easily the most fun this album allows itself to have.

The originals are mostly keepers as well. "The Art" rides a soaring melody along examples of the chants that work into a glisteningly pretty breakdown that all bands dream of. Bassist Michelle Frievald hollers back to Kenney an answer to his previous inquiry "It's too late now," as guitarists Kenney and Jess Vuona grate anguish against each other.

Song titles like "Model America," "Modern Phobias," and "The Easiest Part of Surveillance" suggest a political bent. For the most part, the allusion only presents the heightened arena of present societal alienation as a compelling metaphor to charge very personal songs. "Model America" compares politicians to sharpshooters, but the line between polemic commentary and elucidation of the fragile terrain of Kenney's own insecurities is drawn quite clearly elsewhere in the song. "Modern Phobias" stomps and growls heavily with ferocious might as the lyrics extol that "Cosmonauts now rule the land/ Oxygen and carbon conquer man." There's plenty to insinuate, but Read Yellow wisely do not knock the listeners over the head with ideas. They leave that to the guitars and drums.

It's hard to even imagine the lyrics being so subtle after hearing them being pelted out with such force (except in the two slower songs, "Soleil" and "A Love Supreme.") It's akin to the same sort of confusion that encompasses the jealous musicians caught up in the mystique of Read Yellow's overnight ladder-climbing. There's much more behind the hip wear, the semi-familiar sound, and the decadent sadomasochism of their live show. "Radios Burn Faster" brings us one step closer to understanding just what that is.

Drexler inducted into the Hall of Fame

By JIM VERTUNO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

SAN ANTONIO (AP) — Nicknames have followed Clyde Drexler throughout his basketball career.

In college, he played for the electrifying "Phi Slamma Jamma" teams at the University of Houston. As a pro, he was Clyde "The Glide" for his speed, ball handling and swooping moves to the basket.

As an Olympian, he played on the first "Dream Team."

Now, he can add something a little more formal: Hall of Famer.

Drexler was one of six former players, coaches and team executives announced Monday as the newest members of the Naismith Memorial Basketball Hall of Fame.

Joining him are Lynette Woodard, an Olympic gold medalist and first female Harlem Globetrotter, Bill Sharman, already in the hall as a player who will be inducted as coach, the late Maurice Stokes, the 1956 NBA rookie of the year, Jerry Colangelo, chairman of the Phoenix Suns, and Drazen Dalipagic, an international star from Yugoslavia.

Drexler, who in 1997 was named one of the NBA's 50 greatest players, was humbled to be a new member of the hall.

"I grew up watching a lot of them and to be in the same class as they are is phenomenal," Drexler said. "It kind of validates your career as a basketball player. I think that I'm the luckiest man in the world."

In college, he played in two Final Fours. In his 15-year NBA career, Drexler led the Portland Trail Blazers to the NBA Finals in 1990 and '92, and won a championship with Houston in 1995.

"The fun is in the journey whether you win or lose, you've got to have fun," he said.

Woodard averaged 26 points per game at Kansas and was co-captain of U.S. team that won an Olympic gold medal in 1984. She also played professionally in Europe and two seasons in the WNBA.

Woodard served as interim head coach at Kansas this season in place of Marian Washington, who announced in January she was taking a medical leave and retired in February.

"I started out with a love for the game," she said. "This is magical."

A pioneer of the women's game, she recently attended a practice for a high school all-star team at the women's Final Four in New Orleans.

"Their bodies and arms are totally cut and they run like deer and racehorses and with attitude and passion," Woodard said.

Sharman, inducted as a player in 1976, won titles as a coach in the ABL, the ABA and the NBA. In the 1972 season, he led the Los Angeles Lakers to a 69-13 record, including an NBA record 33-game winning streak.

He joins John Wooden and Lenny Wilkens as the only members enshrined as a player and a coach.

Basketball Hall of Fame inductees Bill Sharman, left to right, Lynette Woodard, Jerry Colangelo and Clyde Drexler hold up their class of 2004 jerseys at the Hall of Fame induction ceremony Monday in San Antonio. The group will be enshrined on Sept. 10 in Springfield.

"We're a young team," Sortino said. "Now that they've got some experience, they've been a lot calmer at the plate. They've found the capacity to wait at the plate for their pitch to come, and not try and rush the pitcher. You can't give experience, you've got to have it."

But games are not won and lost on the tip of a bat, as the pitching has shown. If anything, tomorrow's game will be won on the fielder's glove.

"We've got to have good pitching [today], a solid performance on the mound. The defense will hopefully maintain themselves and play mistake-free, but the pitchers will be a key to a good start," Sortino said.

Between them, aces Kelli Arnold (6-5) and Jenna Busa (8-5) have recorded six shutouts, 15 complete games, allowed 51 earned runs while allowing opponents to bat .229. The Crimson feature a few big bats looking to wreak havoc.

Freshman third/first baseman Virginia Fritsch is on a tear, leading the team in batting (.388) and ranking second in hits (19) and runs batted in (13). Junior first baseman Cecily Gordon follows behind with a .328 average on a team-high twelve runs, 22 hits, 14 RBI and three home runs. She will be one to be wary of for the Crimson, as will be Lauren Stefanchik. She ranks just a point below Gordon in average (.327), and is second in runs as well (11).

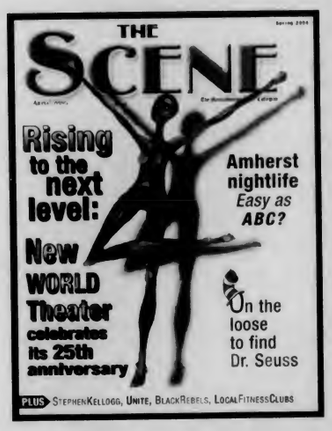
For UMass, Holy Cross represents a challenging warm-up of sorts. No, the Minutemen are not looking past their Patriot League foes, rather they will be preparing their well-rested staff for this weekend's trip to face conference rival Dayton.

Because of this, Stone will be going deep into his bullpen, and will let his starters take an inning so to get acclimated to game-time situations.

"We've been inside playing same inter-squad and some simulated game kind of stuff but it's not the same, so we're going to give each of our guys an inning and see how they do," Stone said.

Over the past week Stone has had his team practicing indoors working on conditioning and fundamentals. He knows the Minutemen still have the taste of victory after their 9-2 victory over Sacred Heart on March 30.

"I think we have people that are looking forward to playing games, because when you play baseball or any other sport you don't want to always practice, you want to play," Stone said.



Today's game will be the 62nd match up between UMass and the Crusaders with UMass holding a 34-26-1 advantage in the all-time series, which began in 1894. The teams last met during the 2003 regular season with the Minutemen posting a 13-3 victory at Holy Cross.

Delays this season have accounted for the latest home opener for the Minutemen in over 10 years. The Minutemen opened the 1993 home campaign on April 6 with a 10-1 victory over Amherst College.

Familiar foes rekindle old rivalry

By Bill Beacon
Associated Press

MONTREAL (AP) — All eyes are on goaltender Jose Theodore as the Montreal Canadiens get set for yet another meeting with the Boston Bruins in the NHL playoffs.

Two years ago, Theodore was magnificent as the Canadiens, seeded eighth in the Eastern Conference, toppled the top-seeded Bruins in six games before being ousted in the second round by Carolina.

Another such effort will likely be needed for seventh-place Montreal to beat second-place Boston this time around.

The best-of-seven series begins Wednesday night in Boston.

"All year, when we played as a team, we were successful," Theodore said Monday after a 90-minute practice at the Bell Centre. "When we play our system, everyone does well, not just one player.

"That's our team's strength — playing as a team."

Still, the Canadiens' success begins with their goaltending and although the Bruins are a bigger team with more firepower in attack, the leveling factor is Theodore's proven ability to steal a series.

"We're a pretty confident bunch with the goaltending we have," said defenseman Craig Rivet. "Jose's shown he's one of the very best goaltenders in the league, so we're pretty confident when we're in front of him.

"We've played a solid system all year and we've beaten top-placed teams, so if we play our system, we feel we'll be successful."

Theodore's opponent in the Boston goal is Andrew Raycroft, who is coming off a brilliant season that will likely earn him rookie of the year honors. But he is as yet untested under playoff pressure.

Raycroft ended the season with 29 wins, a 2.05 goals-against average and a .926 save percentage in 57 games while Theodore had 33 victories, a 2.27 average and .919 save percentage in 67 matches.

"He'll play the way he can and I'll do my best too," said Theodore. "I don't look at it as an individual challenge."

It is a reversal of roles from two years ago, when the upstart Theodore outplayed Boston veteran Byron Dafoe.

Theodore previously had been called in to play in five playoff games while working his way up to a regular NHL job, but the 2002 playoffs marked the first time he went into the post-season as the No. 1 goaltender.

"Now I know what to expect," he said.

Raycroft is in that situation now for Boston.

"Byron Dafoe was there when they were No. 1 in the league two years ago and he was an elite goaltender then," said Rivet.

"They're having success again and their young goaltender (Raycroft) has stepped up. He hasn't really faced a lot of adversity this year. He's played behind a really strong team. But we're looking at them to get really solid goaltending."

The Bruins have had nightmares over the decades about meeting Montreal in the playoffs.

It will be the 30th post-season series between the two Original Six clubs. Montreal is 22-7 so far. Although Boston finished 11 points ahead of Montreal in the regular season, the games between them were close. The Bruins won the season series 3-2-1, but four of the games went into overtime.

The Bruins outscored Montreal only 9-7 over the six games, and the Canadiens won twice in Boston.

"For whatever reason, we seem to match up well with them," said coach Claude Julien. "Maybe they have the size advantage and we have fairly good speed.

"I don't think it will be much different in the playoffs."

A key question for Boston is the health of star center Joe Thornton, who missed the season finale on Sunday with an "upper body injury" that is believed to be in the ribs.

Montreal is fairly healthy, although defenseman Sheldon Souray is suspected to be playing with a sore wrist or shoulder.

Rivet left Montreal's season-ender on Saturday night with a sore back, but looked fine in practice on Monday.

straight Tech attempts to get the ball toward the basket. Yellow Jackets coach Paul Hewitt buried his head in his hands and turned around toward the crowd. He couldn't believe there wasn't a foul — or maybe he just couldn't stomach what was happening to his team.

By that point, the lead had grown to 20, and although Tech's furious rally cut the deficit to seven in the final seconds, the outcome was never in doubt.

Of course, UConn has more — much more — than Okafor, and every element was working.

Gordon, a junior who led the team in scoring, hit all three of his 3-pointers during the first 20 minutes to help the Huskies take a 15-point lead at halftime. His backcourt mate, Taliek Brown, bounced back from a rough game in UConn's semifinal win over Duke to finish with nine points, six rebounds and four assists.

Josh Boone, Rashad Anderson, Charlie Villanueva ... the list goes on and on. No fewer than 10 UConn players made significant contributions in this one.

Anderson celebrated at the end of the game by running around the court with the game ball, laughing and holding his index finger in the air as Okafor chased him. They eventually hugged — a fond farewell for Okafor, a junior who earned his degree in three years and will almost surely leave for the NBA.

The two hooked up beautifully just before halftime, when Okafor snatched a missed free throw, turned and, while still airborne, threw to Anderson, who dribbled to the top of the key and swished a shot at the buzzer. The Huskies pulled it off in five seconds, and looked as if they were the only ones on the floor, instead of playing against five Yellow Jackets.

Tech got nine points and 11 rebounds from Schenscher. Will Bynum led the Jackets with 17 and B.J. Elder had 14, but they simply couldn't shoot on this night. That they shot just 38 percent from the field was understandable, given they were going against Okafor and a lineup that included two more 6-10 guys.

Hammerin' Hank, thirty years after setting the benchmark

By Paul Newberry
Associated Press

ATLANTA (AP) — Thirty years later, Hank Aaron is a bit fuzzy on the pitch Al Downing threw that night in Atlanta-Fulton County Stadium.

"Downing was more of a finesse pitcher," Aaron said, "I guess he was trying to throw me a screwball or something. Whatever it was, I got enough of it."

As the ball sailed over the left-field fence, the Hammer trotted into history, having passed the Babe as the greatest home-run hitter.

No. 715.

It's a figure that still resonates as one of sport's magical milestones. Aaron would go on to hit 40 more homers before he retired in 1976.

While 755 is the target that Barry Bonds chases, it was 715 — struck against Downing and the Los Angeles Dodgers on April 8, 1974 — that stands as the seminal moment for Aaron.

Babe Ruth's 714 became a relic of history, cast aside by a quiet, black man from Mobile, Ala., who endured death threats during his quest.

Aaron spent most of his 23-year career with the Braves, first in Milwaukee, then in Atlanta. The team will honor the 30th anniversary Thursday night before its game against the New York Mets.

"Oh, it really doesn't seem like it's been 30 years," Aaron said in an interview with The Associated Press. "Time really creeps away from you, doesn't it?"

He's 70 now, a landmark reached a couple of months ago, accompanied by reminders of his advancing years. Four of his seven siblings have died. Another is crippled by a stroke. Aaron had to give up tennis because of creaky knees.

But he still leaves the house almost every day at 5:30 a.m., heading to Turner Field for an hour-long workout. He enjoys a round of golf (as long as the cart is included). He looks fit and happy, a successful businessman who owns a car dealership and 17 Krispy Kreme doughnut shops.

"That's why I work out every day," he joked.

Aaron doesn't spend much time watching baseball on TV — "I don't need some announcer to tell me if it's a fastball or a curveball" — but he enjoys getting out to the ballpark.

He went to see Pedro Martinez pitch. Ditto for Randy Johnson.

While Aaron played on just one team that won a World Series, the 1957 Milwaukee Braves, his only regret is failing to capture the Triple Crown.

"Other than that," he said, "everything else was completed."

Aaron's role with the Braves — senior vice president and assistant to the president — is largely ceremonial, but that hasn't stopped him from speaking out on some of the game's most pressing issues.

He's against putting Pete Rose in the Hall of Fame. He wants baseball to adopt a tougher drug-testing policy. He called for more blacks in upper management. He doesn't believe the New York Yankees are assured of a championship just because they spend more.

"I don't think it's good for the game, but I also don't think it guarantees a winner, either," Aaron said. "All those guys they got are used to being the star on their ballclub. They're used to hitting home runs and seeing their name in lights."

When it comes to steroids, Aaron would rather speak in generalities than focus on anyone — especially Bonds, who begins the season with 658 homers.

"I'll just say collectively that all this talk about steroids in baseball is bad," Aaron said. "I wouldn't want anyone setting records if they're on steroids. But none of these guys is accused of anything. It's just being talked about."

Aaron is dismissive of the current testing system, which allows for a one-year suspension only after the fifth positive test for a banned performance-enhancing drug.

"It's got to be much more serious than what we have now," Aaron said. And what does he remember about 715? Mostly, those who watched him break Ruth's record.

Jimmy Carter, then two years away from being elected president, was there on that cool night in Atlanta. So was Maynard Jackson, the city's first black mayor. And don't forget Sammy Davis Jr.

Hank Aaron, Atlanta Braves slugger, eyes the flight of the ball after hitting his 715th home run to break Babe Ruth's all-time home run record, Monday night April 8, 1974, in Atlanta against the Los Angeles Dodgers. With the 30th anniversary coming up on Thursday, the hit still resonates as one of sport's magical milestones. Aaron would go on to hit 40 more homers before he retired in 1976.

The best in the land

By Eddie Pells

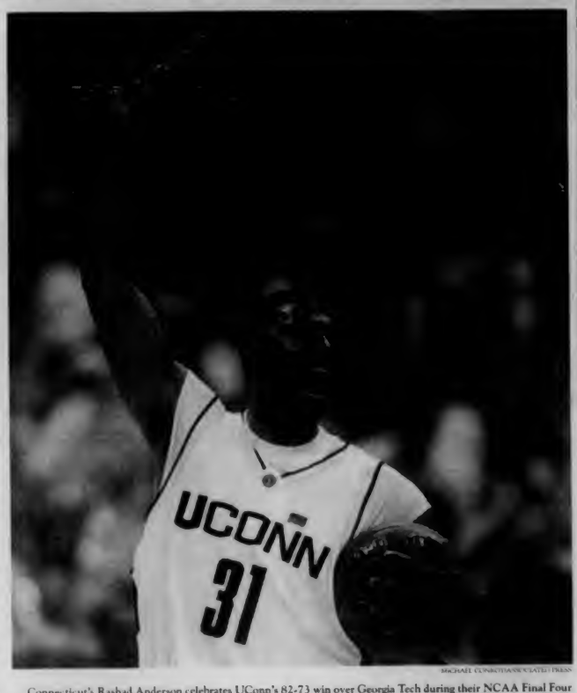
SAN ANTONIO (AP) — The Connecticut Huskies really do have it all: the All-America center, the flashy guards, the coach who gets everything right, and now a national title, which they won with ease.

Led by 24 points from Emeka Okafor and 21 from Ben Gordon, the Huskies outclassed Georgia Tech 82-73 on Monday night to win the championship many predicted they'd get from the very start of the season.

They looked like champions from beginning to end, running when they wanted, controlling the middle at other times, grabbing just about every loose ball and making the Yellow Jackets look ordinary.

UConn became the first team since the 1996 Kentucky Wildcats to win the title after being ranked first in the preseason. The Huskies wound up on top of the college basketball world, thanks to a tall, quick, deep and talented roster put together by coach Jim Calhoun.



Calhoun missed making the Basketball Hall of Fame by one vote this week. After the way he built and guided this team, it's hard to imagine why. He coached UConn to its second championship in six seasons, and joined Mike Krzyzewski and Bob Knight as the only active coaches with multiple titles.

On Tuesday, tiny Storrs, Conn. — the home of the Huskies — could become the undisputed capital of the basketball universe. The women's team takes on Tennessee in the title game in New Orleans, and with a win, Connecticut would become the first school to sweep both championships.

Some say the Huskies' success starts with Okafor, the All-American who had 15 rebounds for his 24th double-double of the season, which was marked by persistent injuries. Prowling the lane on both ends, using his lanky 6-foot-10 frame to block two shots and alter dozens more, he dominated on offense and negated Tech's Aussie center, Luke Schenscher.

Early in the second half, Okafor kept his hands straight up and denied three

Crew victorious in Yankee Cup

By Matt Barstow

Led by an undefeated varsity eight boat, the Massachusetts women's crew team picked up two victories over the weekend to start the 2004 season.

On Saturday, the Minutewomen traveled to Worcester, where they captured gold at the Yankee Cup. The Cup was originally scheduled for last Sunday, but was postponed for a week because of bad rowing conditions in Kingston, R.I.

UMass carried its momentum into Sunday's tri-meet with Columbia and Holy Cross, where it captured its second victory in as many days.

The Yankee Cup saw heavily favored UMass outpace New Hampshire and Rhode Island en route to its first win of the season. The varsity eight was victorious with a time of 6:39.50, while Rhode Island trailed by 15 seconds and New Hampshire brought up the rear (7:11.30).

Carrie Champigny, the boat's coxswain, steered the varsity eight to victory on Saturday and Sunday with help from Faith Harkins and Cat Gariepy, who powered the squad from the one and two seats respectively. Lea Jakobsen, Katie O'Brien, Lauren Cromwell, Lizzy Boyle, Haley McGrath and Stephanie Hoph rounded out the first varsity eight.

The second varsity eight boats finished in the same order as their counterparts, with UMass first (7:06.70), Rhode Island second (7:16.93), and the Wildcats third (7:37.30). Massachusetts captain Kate Bonner led the Maroon and White to victory at stroke, while Lauren Rowell rowed in the seven seat.

UNH and URI forfeited points to UMass in the varsity four races, as they failed to enter qualifying boats.

The Wildcats finished second in last year's New England Championships and returned eight varsity rowers, but failed to finish above third place.

In addition to being postponed, the Yankee Cup was relocated to Lake Quinsigamond in Worcester, which will double as host site for this year's ECAC Championship. The ECAC Championship will be the final competition of the season for Massachusetts on its quest for a second consecutive ECAC title.

On Sunday, the UMass varsity eight finished first with a time of 6:48.01, besting Columbia (6:58.75) and Holy Cross (7:22.50). The second varsity boat and the varsity four of UMass finished behind Columbia, but the Maroon and White escaped with the title because additional points are allotted to the winning varsity eight.

The Massachusetts novice eight joined the varsity in the winners' circle, as it finished in 7:21.43, outpacing Columbia by 10 seconds. Holy Cross did not have a varsity four boat, and finished four seconds behind UMass in the second varsity eight competitions.

Minutemen bring the show home

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

Twenty-five members of the Massachusetts baseball team battled gusting winds as they tried to pull an uncooperative tarp off of Earl Lorden Field yesterday, each hoping that they could finally play on the surface that it had been protecting.

The Minutemen (7-7, 1-2 A-10) had been looking forward to its game against conference rival Richmond, as they were the team that knocked them out of the A-10 championship last season. So when Mother Nature played the spoiler, coach Stone knew his team was upset.

"They should be disappointed, because they should have been ready to play," Stone said. "But the conditions of the field and the amount of rain that we had prior to them traveling up here didn't look very promising."

The Minutemen take on Holy Cross (3-13-2, 2-6 Patriot League) today at 3 p.m. in their home opener. UMass hasn't played a game in over a week, and has had its last four games postponed (one against Hartford and a three-game series versus Richmond), all of which were slated as home matches.

The Crusaders have had a rough season thus far, but only because of their floundering offense. Holy Cross is batting a meager .232, while getting outscored by its opponents 93-to-37. They have scored over five runs only once this season in a 6-9 losing effort against Navy.

Junior catcher Mike Marron leads the team with a .302 batting average and is the only player on the squad hitting over .300.

Conversely the Minutemen are batting .313 as a team and have received contributions from up and down the lineup. Even though the UMass offense dominates that of the Crusaders, coach Stone is simply looking for his team to get out on the field.

"We are trying to play games and play well, I'm not really that concerned about the match-ups or looking at scores because those can be deceiving," Stone said, "Baseball is different, you can't take anybody lightly."

One strong point for Holy Cross has been its pitching staff, which sports an impressive combined ERA of 4.50. The staff has several long relievers who have been nothing short of spectacular this season, and have kept the Crusaders in many of their games.

Minutewomen set to face Crimson after weather hampers schedule

COURTESY KAREN WINGER

Freshman Amanda Morin has 13 hits and six RBIs for the Minutewomen this season. UMass has a double-header against Harvard today in Cambridge, slated to start at 3 p.m.

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

The weather has not been so kind to the Massachusetts softball team as of late.

Tomorrow's doubleheader at Harvard (10-10-1) will be the Minutewomen's first contest in over a week, barring inclement weather. Last Thursday's home game against Maine was rained out, as was Saturday's doubleheader in Philadelphia against St. Joseph's.

"We've been trying to practice indoors, and [yesterday] outside in the cold," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "Basically, we've been working on our fundamentals, mostly our running game. I know it sounds strange considering we have 44 stolen bases this year, but they haven't got it down solid."

Freshman Candice Molinari currently leads the team in the stolen bases category, having converted 10 of her 13 attempts. Senior Aisha Franke is next on that list with a perfect 6-for-6. Sortino hopes the return to basics on baserunning will allow for a lot of extra bases to complement the tremendous hitting power.

Currently riding a seven-game winning streak and having won eight of their last nine, tomorrow should be an indication of how well those practices have paid off for the Minutewomen.

Part of that streak can be attributed to the tremendous hitting in recent weeks. Over their last three games, the Maroon and White have amassed 27 runs on 36 hits and seven home runs.

Four of those seven have came from catcher/third baseman KJ Kelley, who at her current pace may set a new career homer record when all is said and done. The sophomore currently sits in third on the all-time list with 17, just nine homers away from tying the record set by Scooter Wheeler and Brandi Cross.

With batting averages up for Kelley (.303), Hilary Puglia (.308), Aisha Franke (.294), Candice Molinari (.343) and Jamie Cahalan (.266), the Minutewomen are showing no signs of wear in the batter's box.

Bustamante, Murphy hold rally today

AMELIA F. INQUENCIO/COLLEGIAN

Eduardo Bustamante, SGA presidential canidate and winner of this year's original elections, speaks to students at Hillside Dining Common yesterday.

By Melissa Blankstein

Their first attempt started slow, but as the hour drew on, Eduardo Bustamante and Matthew Murphy, self-proclaimed Student Government Association president and trustee in exile, enticed UMass students to stop and talk at their first "Back to the People" community meeting at Worcester Dining Commons last night.

"I'm trying to get people to come and talk to me in a generally ineffective format," Bustamante joked at the beginning of the hour.

Bustamante and Murphy set up post in the hallway outside of the Hillside Dining Common around 6:30 p.m. last night, with two posters and a stack of flyers advocating their 10-point program.

"We're just trying to introduce ourselves," Murphy said.

"The idea of this was to use resources of the president to bring SGA back to the people to hear their concerns and that would mean advertising," Bustamante said. "Being that we're not working with that, it's more just two people trying their hardest. The effects are going to be slightly different."

"Unfortunately we couldn't [book space in the DC] because we're not part of a student organization yet," Murphy said.

Friends, active graduate students, other SGA officials, and many undergraduate students were greeting and speaking to Bustamante as they walked by.

Both candidates spoke freely about the elections, the elections process and what the candidates would want to improve or change at the University.

Bustamante said he is optimistic of the upcoming presidential elections on April 28 and 29.

"At the end of the month, we're going to get to do it again and do it all right," Bustamante said.

Tomorrow, Murphy and Bustamante will hold a rally at the Student Union from noon to 1 p.m. The rally will give the candidates a chance to explain to the student body about the recent decision by the SGA not to ratify the elections, and what students can expect from the SGA in the future. The Cannabis Reform Coalition will be hosting a mock swearing in.

"A lot of people are angry and upset about what has happened," Murphy said. "Tomorrow, we're going to try to turn a lot of that anger into productive stuff, like knocking on doors."

Springfield club closes permanently

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — A downtown nightclub has decided to close its doors permanently rather than figlht the city's efforts to shut it down because of numerous fire and safety violations.

City inspectors closed The Asylum in March. Club owners, who faced a Thursday hearing about the violations, agreed to surrender their licenses rather than try to reopen.

"Effectively, their licenses are no longer owned by them and can't be used," city solicitor Patrick J. Markes said.

"They signed an agreement to relinquish them."

Owners planned to turn over their entertainment license, Sunday entertainment license and food and beverage license to the city. They hadn't done so by late Tuesday, as planned, but Markes said that is of no legal consequence because of the signed agreement.

"It's one less hazard that we have to worry about," District Fire Chief John F. Cossaboom told The Springfield Republican.

The all-night dance club, which catered to an under-21 crowd and didn't serve alcohol, was shut down March 12 by Cossaboom as a public safety hazard after it was cited for 21 safety code violations.

Fire Department inspectors said they found exposed wiring, hanging black plastic sheets and combustible materials in the basement. The club was allegedly using an upstairs room illegally, and inspectors found a cluttered rear-exit passageway and partially

"That was another Rhode Island just waiting to happen," said Cossaboom, referring to the February 2003 nightclub fire in West Warwick, R.I., that killed 100 people.

There was no answer at the club Tuesday. An undated message posted on the club's Web site said, "We regret to inform you that the Asylum Nightclub will no longer be opening its doors." The message was signed "Staff and Management of True Productions and The Legendary Asylum Nightclub."

Mayor Charles V. Ryan called the club a "recipe for disaster."

"It is clear we were fortunate to avert a catastrophe," Ryan said.

UMass fencing team duels to victory at Collegiate Nationals

By Matt Casey
Collegian Correspondent

DURHAM, N.H. — The University of Massachusetts fencing team finished in first place at Sunday's Second Annual U.S. Collegiate Club Nationals at the University of New Hampshire for the second year in a row, defeating 21 other teams.

UMass won seven trophies at the University of New Hampshire: first place for men's foil, first place for the women's team and first place overall. It took third place for women's epee, foil and saber, and second place for men's team as well. Seven of the team's 18 competing individuals also advanced from team to individual competition.

The outcome excited UMass coaches and competitors.

"I'm very proud of everyone," said assistant coach Taro Yamashita.

"There are no words. I'm too happy right now," said men's foilist Patrick Reardon after the competition.

Team members attributed their victory to team spirit and working together.

"We won as a squad," said team captain Leo Cook. "We weren't going to win individually. We were only going to win as a squad."

Cornell's coach Andrew Stewart pointed to similar reasons for their narrow victory over UMass in the men's three-weapon competition.

Cornell's head coach said his team won through much camaraderie and hard work.

"The team spirit was great this weekend," he said.

UMass head coach Brad Baker held high expectations for the team from the start because of their performance at last year's competition at the University of Florida. There, they won second place for men's saber, men's epee, and women's three weapon team, tied for first place for men's three weapon team, and finished in first place for men's foil, women's epee and overall six-weapon team.

On the first day, UMass battled through 12 rounds of six-weapon team competition, lasting nine hours. The men and women's teams beat all 12 of the schools they clashed with. Several individuals, including Erica Antill and Tyler Iaboson of the women's foil squad emerged undefeated.

Team members worried about their competition schedule for the second day, which looked more difficult than the first with the strong competitors of Army, Florida, UNH, North Western University and Cornell within six rounds of each other.

Two fencers at the Second Annual U.S. Collegiate Club Nationals at UNH on Sunday.

Before competition started the second day, all six of the team's squads ranked in the top five for their gender and weapon. The overall men's team, overall women's team and combined men's and women's team all ranked first.

UMass lost to Army 8-10 in round 13, their first loss of the tournament. They lost two more rounds by the same margin, one to the University of Florida and one to UNH.

Despite the loss to UNH, Reardon scored an impressive winning touch against his opponent. He disarmed his opponent, and then planted his tip on his opponent's chest.

Phil Bazeley, the men's saber squad captain, achieved a similar dramatic victory for the team in round 14, when he snapped the blade off his opponent's weapon and scored the winning point with one stroke.

UMass made a triumphant showing despite their second day losses. They secured first place for men's foil, women's three-weapon team and overall six-weapon team. Men's foil beat Army by only a single bout, and the women's three-weapon team beat the University of Florida by the same margin.

'People meter' TV ratings delayed after minority protest

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — After accusations that black and Hispanic viewers were being undercounted, Nielsen Media Research agreed Tuesday to delay its rollout of its new "people meter" television rating system.

Nielsen insists its numbers are accurate, but agreed to the delay "out of respect and concern for how the community sees this," said Susan Whiting, the company's president and CEO.

In tests of the new system, almost all of the most popular shows in black households dropped in the ratings, some up to 60 percent. Whiting announced the decision to put off Thursday's scheduled launch until June 3 at a news conference in U.S. Rep. Charles Rangel's (D-N.Y.) Harlem office.

Rangel, who said he had just been made aware of the concerns, said he and Nielsen would form a task force to study the issue.

"I'm satisfied that at least I'll have the time to figure this out," he said.

Nielsen is in the midst of a gradual rollout of its "people meter" in the nation's largest television markets.

Currently, 500 households in each big city record their viewing habits in a diary kept during four ratings "sweeps" months. The new system uses a larger sample — 800 households — and electronically records what people are watching every day through a device connected to their TV.

Nielsen already uses the "people meters" to measure national ratings in an entirely different sample.

Boston is the only city where the new local system is operating. Nielsen — which wants

Attacks spread to Iraq cities

Twelve Marines may be dead

By Hamza Hendawi
Associated Press

NAJAF, Iraq (AP) — Iraqi insurgents and rebellious Shiites mounted a string of attacks across the south and fought pitched battles against Marines in the turbulent city of Fallujah on Tuesday. Up to a dozen Marines, two more coalition soldiers and at least 66 Iraqis were reported killed.

Reports from the city of Ramadi, near Fallujah, said dozens of Iraqis attacked a Marine position near the governor's palace, a senior defense official said from Washington. "A significant number" of Marines were killed, and initial reports indicate it may be up to a dozen, said the official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

U.S. authorities also launched a crackdown on radical Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr al-Sadr and his militia after a series of weekend uprisings in Baghdad and cities and towns to the south that took a heavy toll in both American and Iraqi lives, Sunday. Excluding the report out of Ramadi on Tuesday evening, at least 614 American troops have died in Iraq since the war.

Interior minister for ousted President Aristide arrested for alleged murder of opponents

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti (AP) — Ousted President Jean-Bertrand Aristide's interior minister was arrested Tuesday on suspicion of orchestrating the killings of several people presumed to be Aristide opponents, officials said.

The arrest of Jocelerme Privert — the highest ranking official to be detained since Aristide's departure on Feb. 29 — comes as former government leaders and members of Aristide's political party have complained that Haiti's interim leaders are targeting them.

"I hope this is done with due process because if not it appears to be a witch hunt," said Leslie Voltaire, a former Aristide Cabinet member. "We don't think it's a good step for rebuilding the country."

Privert was accused in the mid-February killings of several suspected Aristide opponents in St. Marc, a northern port city where violence flared before the armed rebellion that pushed Aristide from power, the new government said.

Although Privert allegedly conspired to kill several people in the town, officials did not say how many people were killed, nor did they provide names of those allegedly slain.

"The procedure is going to follow its normal course," the interim justice minister, Bernard Gousse, told The Associated Press.

Privert was being held at the national penitentiary. Law requires that he hear the charges against him within 48 hours.

Penitentiary Inspector Olmaille Bien-Aime said Privert's cell was being guarded by U.S. Marines who are part of a peacekeeping force. But U.S. Embassy spokeswoman Mara Tekach-Bell denied the claim, saying, "He's not in our hands."

Earlier this year, the United States canceled Privert's U.S. tourist visa but did not explain why. The United States has canceled the visas of more than a dozen Aristide government officials in the past year, some because of alleged connections to drug trafficking.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said during a one-day visit on Monday that American judicial authorities were investigating Aristide on corruption charges.

"There are inquiries being made by our judicial authorities in the U.S. to see if there is any evidence of wrongdoing," Powell said in a news conference. It was unclear whether the U.S. government was investigating other members of Aristide's government.

Quality In Everything We Do

Motives of 9-11 panel at stake

BY HOPE YEN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) — Condoleezza Rice isn't the only one with a lot riding on her appearance Thursday before the Sept. 11 commission.

If panel members appear politically motivated in their questioning of the national security adviser, it could raise questions about their credibility — and the findings in their final report this summer.

Thomas H. Kean, the panel's Republican chairman, says he and Democratic vice chairman, Lee Hamilton, are mindful of the political overtones in a presidential election year.

They issued an edict to fellow commissioners after last week's politically charged testimony from former government counter-terror chief Richard Clarke. The message: Leave politics out of it.

"In a very difficult atmosphere, in a town that is the most polarized I've ever seen, the commission is trying to do a job for the American people that is to the best of our ability nonpolitical," Kean said in an interview. "That is enormously hard to do, but I think we can get it done and people should leave us alone."

Nolan McCarty, a Princeton University professor of politics and public affairs, said Rice's testimony would offer a stern test for the panel.

"Partisanship is almost inevitable," he said. "There's going to be pressure from all quarters to reach specific conclusions either in exonerating the current administration or blasting the previous administration or the reverse. This may be the low point."

Kean, a former New Jersey governor, expressed frustration with people in Washington who he said are intent on politicizing the commission's work. While panel members are political appointees who have diverse points of view and different constituencies, they are fair-minded and get along well, he said.

The 10-member panel, made up of five Republicans and five Democrats, was criticized by some relatives of Sept. 11 victims after two GOP commissioners sharply questioned the motivations of Clarke, who testified that President Bush hadn't considered the al-Qaida threat an urgent priority.

The commissioners, Fred Fielding, who served as President Reagan's legal counsel, and former Illinois Gov. Jim Thompson, received calls from the White House during Clarke's testimony. Kean said that in those calls the two were acting as go-betweens in hopes of getting Rice to testify that day.

But some relatives wondered whether the White House fed them information for their questioning of Clarke. They worry that more partisanship might be in store during the Rice hearing.

"I think the fix is in," said Debra Burlingame, whose brother had been the pilot of American Flight 77, which crashed into the Pentagon. "There will be partisan elements of that panel who will be looking for a way to embarrass or discredit the Bush administration," she said.

This isn't the first time the commission has had to fend off questions about the political leanings of members. Other questions involve:

Commission executive director Philip Zelikow's ties to the Bush administration. Zelikow served on the Bush transition team for taking office and is friends with Rice, who co-wrote with him a 1995 book on German history.

Falling Spanish channel ratings urges 'meter' delay

"people meters" in the 10 largest cities by 2006 — has similarly delayed launches in Chicago and Los Angeles.

In Los Angeles, there were concerns the new sample did not have enough minority representation, Nielsen said.

That's not the case in New York; Whiting claims the new sample better represents the city's ethnic makeup than the group filling out diaries.

However, during test runs of the new system, virtually all of the most popular programs in black households showed ratings declines, some more than 60 percent, according to U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who had urged the delay.

Spanish-language networks also saw ratings slips, Clinton said.

Nielsen ratings are the currency of the television industry, with the measurements used to set local advertising rates. Shows with low ratings are less valuable to advertisers and vulnerable to cancellation.

News Corp., which owns the Fox television network and several local stations that carry UPN, has protested the new system. Some UPN shows with largely black casts, including "The Parkers," have been affected.

Differences between the two systems are to be expected, Whiting said, because they are two different samples.

In general, the "people meters" are showing higher ratings for many cable networks, she said. The electronic meters accurately record when viewers channel surf between channels.

When relying on people to later write down what they watched in diaries, this flipping between channels often goes uncounted, she said.

"The new system is much more accurate," Whiting said.

Fencing club wins seven trophies at UNH on Sunday

UMass fencers proceeded to individual competition. Matt Franco and Patrick Reardon for men's foil, Kathy Baldasty and Jessica Yu for women's epee, Stephanie Myers and Sarah Girard for Women's Saber, and Tyler Jacobson for Women's foil all finished within the top five of their weapon slot. Girard finished first in her slot.

"I think I fenced pretty well this weekend. My mind game was there," said Girard.

Only nine of about 60 competitors from each weapon in each gender went on to individual rounds.

Jessica Yu and Tyler Jacobson both ranked third for their weapon, while Patrick Reardon came in second for men's foil and Stephanie Myers won first place for women's saber.

In addition to the 18 competitors, UMass brought nearly 20 teammates that did not compete in the tournament. This collection of people swarmed around the competition area and cheered for the fencers. They shouted loudest at dramatic points such as the end of round 14, when victory or defeat came down to the last point of top epeeist Orin Mase's bout. One spectator reported that he screamed to the point of tasting blood.

Some non-competing team members carried a garden gnome with them. Certain competitors rubbed or kissed it for luck.

Nick Oulette, UMass' top male saberist, bought it Friday as a joke and named it Token.

"[Token] had a positive influence on our fencing over the past few days," Oulette said.

Protection a must for Five College students

April is Sexually Transmitted Diseases Awareness month. Since early high school, and even middle school, our generation has been hammered over the head with information on safe sex. Condoms, birth control, dentals dams, abstinence. The options seem endless, and the lists are so familiar they have become redundant. Perhaps a little too redundant.

President Bush is currently in a heated debate concerning the fine print on condom labels. Bush is urging the Food and Drug Administration for the package to state that condoms protect against Human Papillomovirus, or HPV. Abstinence groups, which use HPV as an argument for saving sex until marriage, strongly oppose the changes. On the other hand, scientists are urging the FDA to pass the change, advocating condoms as an efficient method of preventing some STDs.

Although most educated American adults believe they are well versed in the discourse of sexual health, our behavior is suggesting otherwise.

No matter what the FDA decides, sadly, most of us won't notice the difference. According to CNN.com, an American Social Health Association poll revealed yesterday that almost half of sexually active Americans are not using condoms. Eighty-two percent do not use barrier methods while having oral sex. The ASHA survey polled more than 1,155 adults between ages 18 and 35.

"[The study was to] look for disparities between level of knowledge and risk-taking behavior. In this instance the respondents on the survey said that they thought they had quite a bit of information about sexually transmitted diseases. And yet they did not act as though they knew that information," said Dr. James Allen, president of the American Social Health Association.

Although 1 out of 4 adults will contract an STD in their lifetime, Americans as a whole don't seem to be concerned. Ninety percent of the people surveyed simply assumed their partner was disease-free, and a third never even talked about it.

By failing to communicate with partners and be advocates for our own safety and well being, our age group is taking risks that will potentially cost us our lives. Simply assuming a partner is "clean" is unacceptable — failure to use a condom when caught in the heat of the moment is irresponsible. As some of the most intelligent, well-educated people in the country, students in the Five College area have no excuse not to take an active role, not only concerning their own health, but also actively preventing the spread of STDs.

Free protection methods are available almost everywhere in the Five College area. On the UMass campus, Health Services provide free condoms. And organizations such as Tapestry in downtown Amherst also all provide free condoms, as well as birth control, pregnancy, and HIV/STD testing. Condoms are also available in nearly every convenience store on the UMass campus. Although we compromise only a quarter of sexually active people in the United States, young adults account for almost half of all STD cases in the United States. If young Americans utilize resources and knowledge we have, we can prevent a future drain on the American medical system — ourselves.

Ben Feder

I've learned a lot about perception recently. I've started to see the world in a new light as it were. I was at my buddy's house on Saturday evening enjoying a game of Beirut. My friend and I, while setting up our cups in our intoxicated delight, were sure we had this game beat. Our opponents didn't look so tough. Both from UMass-Dartmouth, this Beirut game went beyond drunken reverie and became a stand off between two schools with reputations on the line.

On the left was a short brunette by the name of Samantha "Sammi" LeBlanc. She's cute, with long dark hair and a low cut shirt, and we figure that she'll only be a distraction and won't rink a single cup. Her partner is her friend Steven "Vitty" Ciras. A normal looking guy, he'll have to carry his team and so it'll be one and a half against two.

Could we have been further from the truth?

Let's just say that the truth was hooking up in another room, leaving us two fools with the taste of foot in our mouths. First off, Sammi is from Gardner, a place where they drink as if their beer owes them money. They take competition just as seriously and that same ferocity is seen in their drinking games.

She sank the first cup. Vitty followed with a similar shot, and the two slapped hands. My bud and I could only watch as they went for two more rounds. By the time we started taking shots we were down four to seven. They dominated until we came back and tied it one cup each. They, of course, sank their first shot. We miraculously got one shot in and went in to overtime. Our quick victory became a quick defeat as they sealed the deal and sank both their shots in to our remaining cup. We were their fifth consecutive victims, and they went undefeated for 21 games before the night was over. "So what, it's only beer-pong," I said.

"This is Beirut,' said Vitty.

I've always believed that anyone who calls this game "Beirut" is either a rich, preppy kid or someone trying to bring sophistication to throwing a ball into beer-filled cups. What Vitty explained to me is that beer-pong is actually played with paddles, where Beirut is not. Since Ping-Pong paddles are not something an average student possesses, the paddles were tossed but the name stuck. Well I guess I was zero for two this night.

Guys prefer a little bit of romance just like the ladies do. Only our romance usually comes in nacho form with a side of cheese sticks.

On a similar night, I was sitting at McMurphy's enjoying a pint and listening to the Guitar Dudes with another friend. A woman approached us and, turning to my friend, said one of the most memorable things ever to lodge itself in my brain. "Want to take me home and make me lactate?" she said.

My friend stopped his beer in mid swig and stared at me, matching my own wide-eyed, dropped-jaw expression. He looked at me for some answer, apparently I'm the expert in pick-up lines, but I could offer none. Never have I heard of a woman coming up to a guy in this way. Or of a woman coming up to a guy at all. I could only stare at the bar top and struggle to stomach my beer while my brain came up with dozens of images to accompany this woman's sentence. My friend followed my lead and humbly muttered "no thanks."

Where was the macho gusto? The excitement and allure of a woman brazenly approaching a guy and demanding only what his wildest dreams can behold? Gone. We were scared. A woman who is that comfortable to express bodily functions of that magnitude openly can only have terrible intentions for us. Plus guys prefer a little bit of romance just like the ladies do. Only our romance usually comes in nacho form with a side of cheese sticks.

When the lady left for easier prey, my friend turned to me and said, "I guess times are changing." I've never considered it until that point but he's right. We have robot vacuum cleaners, digital cameras in cell phones, and now women are leveling the playing field and making the first move. The future is upon us and just in time too.

With my comfortable days in the womb of college dwindling swiftly, what comes next is going to be as exciting as a 21-0 beirut record, and as unexpected as a woman not ashamed to use body functions as pick-up line material. There's always something new to learn.

You could always go to Gardner and challenge them to Beirut. You'll definitely learn something there. Just don't bet any money.

The varied joys of Passover

Rachel Smith

"This is the bread of (oppression, poverty, simplicity) which our ancestors ate in the land of Egypt. Let all who are hungry come and eat. Let all who are needy come and celebrate the Passover. At present we are here; next year may we be in Israel. At present we are slaves; next year may we be free people."

So begins one of the prayers Jews around the world said this week at Seders, the traditional Passover meal and ritual.

It seems that Jews only make headlines when there's a conflict in Israel. Considering that Jews are only 2 percent of the U.S. population, according to a study referenced by the U.S. Census in 2000, it breaks my heart that many Americans probably understand Jews and Judaism through the lenses of the mass media and coverage of Israeli politics.

Not all Jews are Israeli and not all Israelis are Jews. Many Jews are pro-Israel, but many are not. Israel is at the center of many Jews' religious and ethnic beliefs; I support an Israeli state but I frequently disagree with the Israeli government.

Since I'm fortunate enough to have a public forum, I'd like to bend your ear just long enough to give you my take on Judaism, told through the story of my favorite holiday, Passover.

I'm not the most observant Jew in the world and I'm certainly no Judaic expert, but I never feel closer to my faith, my ethnicity and the world at large than I do during the Passover Seder.

Most people recognize Passover as the celebration of the Israelites' liberation from enslavement in Egypt as told in the book of Exodus. Moses instructed the Jews to kill a lamb and mark their doors with the lamb's blood, allowing God to pass over Jewish homes and smite the first-born children of the Egyptians. The Pharaoh was so distressed over the death of his first-born child that he allowed Moses to lead the Jews out of Egypt.

Passover isn't just about the words of the Torah; I equate Passover with the living spirit and traditions of Judaism including social justice and giving food to the hungry.

For me, a modern and only barely observant Jew, Passover is about community service and social activism. The Seder is where friends and family eat together and commemorate both the suffering and the liberation of Jewish people throughout the ages. There's no better way to honor Jews who have been persecuted, whether in Egypt by the Pharaoh, in Russia by the Tsar's pogroms, or in Germany by the Nazis, than by helping those who are less fortunate today, regardless of their religion or nationality.

Passover isn't just about the words of the Torah; I equate Passover with the living spirit and traditions of Judaism including social justice and giving food to the hungry.

At the Seder table, Jews eat bitter herbs dipped in salt water. I assure you, we don't eat this stuff because it tastes good. The herbs represent the arduous struggle of Israelites in bondage and the salt water represents their tears, according to many interpretations of the Torah. For me, this tradition doesn't just represent the struggle of the Israelites in Egypt, or even of Jews around the world, but rather the injustices and hardships of all people everywhere.

Passover is also a holiday of questions, specifically "why." The youngest person at a Seder asks a series of questions about Passover traditions. The answers all come from the Torah and help explain the story of Exodus and the Israelites journey out of slavery. In modern Judaism, asking "why" is as much about survival as it is about the pursuit of knowledge. What if the German people had questioned the Nazi party after World War I?

The spirit of Passover is accessible to everybody, not just those who practice the Jewish religion. Everybody should question the world around us, and if we don't like the answers there's nothing stopping us from engaging in the social activism that's also part of the Passover custom.

This week, Jews around the world are giving money and food to the less fortunate, another Passover tradition. There's no better way to celebrate Jews' and other oppressed people's liberation from slavery than by helping people who are subjugated, whether by economic, political or other conditions.

During a traditional Seder, the host leaves his or her front door open to allow Elijah the Prophet enter in the hopes he might announce he is the Messiah but it also can be perceived as a way to let anybody who is hungry sit down at the Passover meal and eat. Today, most people aren't safe enough to leave their door open and welcome strangers into their homes. Instead of leaving my door open, I've resolved to leave my mind and my heart open to those who need my help. There's so much conflict around the world, especially in Israel, that now more than ever it's vital that people listen to each other.

My hope this year is for Jews and non-Jews to remember not necessarily the story of Passover but the spirit of the holiday. We must continue to ask "why?," especially when it's most difficult to ask. We must also extend our hands when people need help.

Jews must take an objective, critical look at Israeli government and policy. Likewise, those who are already critical of the Israeli government must tread carefully and not let political condemnation lead to anti-Semitism. No one struggle for justice outweighs another; until we are all free, we are all slaves.

The bitter truth

Paige Cram

Why is it that certain names, certain places can still get under our skin no matter how much time passes? Why can events or people still have an effect on us years later?

The reason is that deep down you haven't let go of those feelings. You still feel that there is something to be said or done in order to make things right. In short, you are bitter about the way things worked out. It's a feeling that most of us are taught is inappropriate; we're supposed to grow up and move on. But it's not always that simple.

I'll admit it: I am bitter. I'm bitter about things in the past that I can never change and about the fact that what goes around does not necessarily always come around. Sometimes the bad guy wins, and I'm bitter that that's the truth about the real world.

I'm not a pessimistic person; it's just that there are certain situations that make me passionate about this injustice that will never be righted, and I cannot help but react.

I don't think I dwell on the past. I believe in my heart that every choice I've made and everything that's happened to me has happened for a reason. I believe that I've ended up where I'm supposed to be, and I am beyond happy with the way things have worked out. But bitterness is a funny thing. If there's something you haven't quite let go of, it has the power to override all other emotions — not to mention logic and common sense.

Bitterness is a funny thing. If there's something you haven't quite let go of, it has the power to override all other emotions — not to mention logic and common sense.

You know exactly what I'm talking about, like that annoying kid who used to call you Four Eyes in the seventh grade. Although you have contacts now and have gotten over the insecurity of glasses, you still hate him. Whenever his name comes up in discussion of your childhood, you feel that same rush of anger. If only he could see you now, he'd be sorry he ever teased you. It doesn't matter if he's grown into a perfectly nice guy who doesn't even remember making fun of you; you'd still beat the crap out of him if you had the chance. He scarred you, and you will never forgive him.

Or what about the manager who turned you down for that job you were perfect for. You just can't wait to show her. Even after you get a job that's 10 times better, it's not enough. You want to bump into her in a coffee shop somewhere and rub it in her face, just so she knows she was wrong. You imagine that once you're a big shot, she'll hear all about you and think to herself, "I guess I missed the boat on that one." But in reality you know that even if she does come across your name in some newspaper article, she won't recognize it.

This is where the bitterness stems from.

It's that sense of un-avenged wrong that won't allow you to let go. It's a lack of closure to situations in our past that will forever be a part of us. It's that open wound that can never fully heal because someone occasionally throws salt in it.

There may be a few of you out there who have gotten through your lives bitterness-free. To you, the rest of us are probably just grudge-holders and resentful cynics who are stuck in the past. It's not that we're incapable of forgiveness. Maybe there are just some insults that can't be forgiven, some hurts that are just too deep to forget. Does that make us immature? Are we bad people because we want to see some justice done on our behalf?

Yeah, yeah, two wrongs don't make a right and life isn't always fair. Blah. Blah. Blah. I say an eye for an eye. Maybe it is childish, but it's a feeling we all experience from time to time. Nobody wants to see the bad guy get away, and nobody wants to think of the bully becoming successful. It's just not the happy ending we hope for. And although I may have found my own happy ending, I feel like it's not really complete until all the loose ends are tied up and all those who underestimated me have learned their lesson.

It will never happen. Deep down we all know that, but how can we learn to accept it and move on? It's too late for closure: the kid from seventh grade moved to Texas and you can't even remember his last name; the manager got transferred to an overseas branch. So what is there to do?

The only thing to do is to make peace with them in your head. Good or bad, they contributed to who you are today and there is certainly no way you would want to change that. So what if the thorns from your past are still thriving somewhere?

You are successful and happy and that is what matters most. In fact, you should be thanking those people because they started you on the path you are on right now ... and that path seems to be leading to pretty good places. You can't change the past so you might as well accept it, and the next time it comes back to haunt you, hopefully it won't be quite so emotionally disruptive.

But then again, it may be a lot easier to just imagine all the people who've ever wronged you huddled together in an alley while warming their hands over the same trashcan fire. Heh. Heh. Heh.

A closer look at the SGA debate controversy

Getting it right the second time

Mark Morrison

The Student Government Association has been taking a lot of heat for the activities of last week. Last Tuesday, the Student Judiciary decided that Instant Runoff Voting made the spring 2004 elections unconstitutional. The next day, the Senate decided not to ratify the elections. Two independent branches of government have now said that this election was a complete debacle and that new elections must be held.

Some errors during elections are inevitable and forgivable. Some errors, however, threaten the very essence of democracy. In this election, we saw more than enough of each type. The Commission wasn't ready for Election Day, and throughout the process, Steve Hoeschele, chancellor of elections, displayed his misunderstanding of the IRV system he fought so hard to implement. Mistakes abounded — from polling stations not being staffed with enough officials to people voting more than once. The Commission didn't do its job. This Commission is paid and appointed to do two things: staff polling stations and count ballots. These two simple tasks are all the Commission has to do, and they couldn't even do that.

They wouldn't allow people to vote absentee because they hadn't bought enough envelopes. They "found" more ballots after the first night of counting, after they'd moved the ballot boxes several times. The Commission forced people to write their names on their ballots, thus violating the secrecy of the vote, because the Commission wasn't prepared to properly record each voter's information. They failed to open a major polling station even though they had a month to plan for the two days of voting. Most importantly, and most alarming, their mistakes allowed people to vote twice because they didn't have enough staff and didn't even understand how to give out ballots.

Two concerns have been raised against holding another election: First, the legitimacy of the winner of the election and second, the cost of a second election. I'll address the financial concerns by asking two simple questions: How much are student rights worth? How much is a clean election worth? I think democracy and effective political representation are worth more than $5,000, and I think students deserve that representation.

In terms of legitimacy, what is the legitimacy of a president who would have taken office, and in this case fought to be placed into office, after learning that students voted twice and some were not allowed to vote at all? What legitimacy does our trustee have, if he does not care that 3,000 students in the Southwest Residential Area were lied to and told that they could vote at Berkshire Dining Common — only to find no ballots, no elections workers, and no sign that the elections were even taking place for 60 percent of the voting time? Finally, what legitimacy do any of our Area Government officers have if they did not come before the Senate to argue against an election that allowed people from outside their constituency to vote for them?

An unfair election cannot produce legitimate leaders. If these elections had not been thrown out, the political process would have failed, the elected officials would be questioned in all that they do, and the SGA would be less able to represent undergraduate students in our community.

So now we have Jared Nokes as president, even though no one — not even Nokes himself — wants him as president. We have a person who received one vote in his entire career in the office of the president, but he got there legitimately. He didn't manipulate the system and magically place himself into power; he was forced into it by the Judiciary decision that enforced the safeguards in our laws. The important thing now is that we have another shot to get a new president, trustee, and Area Government officers.

The new elections will be April 28 and 29, and students have an advantage like never before. We have seen the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Patrick Higgins, vote against ratification of the failed election because he felt that the right of students were violated. We have seen the governor of Southwest, Tim Daly, watch from the sidelines and fight for the residents of Southwest South who were not given the chance to vote at Berkshire. We have seen Senators Eddie Bustamante and Matt Murphy try to fight their way into power because they felt the elections were legitimate. Former President Dave Carr and I had parts in challenging this election, and the result was to throw it out. It wouldn't be ethical for us to run again. I wish you all the best of luck in choosing your new leaders. Choose wisely and make sure you get what — and who — you vote for.

Mark Morrison is the former attorney general of the Student Government Association.

Democracy, what democracy?

Vika Bandari

Visions of the 2000 presidential elections crowded my mind as I stood in room 1010 of the Campus Center last Wednesday night. Memories of Bush being sworn in as the president of the United States came rushing back as I watched Speaker Jared Nokes being sworn in as the president of the Student Government Association.

One question resounded in my head. How is it that in a democracy, where the motto is "for the people, by the people," do we have a president who did not win the popular vote?

As I walked home from the meeting, I realized that from now until the end of April, Nokes would be representing me. I guess some people may argue that one month is not a long time, but I beg to differ. We have seen that it takes a day to declare war, an hour to destroy a city, and a minute to make a deadly decision. I am fearful of the decisions Nokes will make in these coming weeks.

Now, I would like to address our beloved senators, the people who we trusted to represent our opinions and concerns. What perturbed me the most during the senate meeting is not that the senate declined to ratify the motion regarding the constitutionality of the elections, it is that some senators (shockingly, the majority were campaigning for the other presidential and trustee candidates) did not even want to hear the motion.

Students were there to be heard, not to be silenced!

Even if nothing can be changed, at least we would have the satisfaction of knowing that the people we elected were adequately representing us.

Senators, let's not forget what happened in Spain. People were infuriated because Spain supported America even though the people did not favor it. Remember, we have the ability to put you in power, and we have the ability to take you out of power.

Students of the University of Massachusetts, each one of you may have your own opinion on whether the motion about constitutionality should have been ratified or not. My main concern is that some senators attempted to silence their constituents.

These are the names of the senators who voted "nay" to listen to the motion: Patrick Higgens (presidential candidate), Marc Lerman, Meredith Rice, Jamie Carliss, Lindsay Lesser, Brian Roberts, Lauren Belsito, Monique Quiles, Timothy Busiere, James Brennan, Adrienne Girard, Raul Brens, Deirdra Feeley (abstained) and Michael Sheridan (abstained).

When senate elections take place next semester, all of you will be informed of which senators could deny your voice. Remember these senators did not want to listen to me or the other 100 students that showed up at the meeting. What is the guarantee that they will listen to any of you when you face a problem?

And to Eddie Bustamante, All I can say is that I am so sorry.

You have been stripped of your position. I truly felt like this school can use a president who is passionate about positive change. I remember the first time I came across your name. I was reading an editorial that you wrote in this paper. You advocated for lower tuition, more faculty and better services. You ended the article by saying, "if you are looking for what I am looking for, contact me."

Well, I am looking for what you are looking for. That is why I voted for you. When I read that article, all I could think about was how much passion was ingrained into your words.

And, when you ran for president, I, as well as many other students, went to the polls and voted. I had hope on March 25. Hope that after I graduate, the University of Massachusetts will be under the leadership of a student who will continuously fight for the concerns of students.

Martin Luther King Jr. once said, "injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere." Nokes being named president is an injustice.

Do not regard the politics of UMass as miniscule. The leaders we have now may one day be the leaders of our nation. For them to lead us, we need to show them how we want to be led.

I urge students to come out and vote on April 28 and 29, regardless of whom you choose to vote for. At least then, we will have a president who reflects the preference of the students body. Hopefully, justice will be served, and my faith in the democratic system can be restored.

Technology in need of repair

Erika Lovley

It's a common phrase heard in the lecture halls of the University of Massachusetts campus.

"Please take out your PRS."

It is the signal for 200 students to begin digging through their bags for the Personal Response System, a black, $33.50 blue-buttoned remote control. It may be small, but this little remote holds the capacity to transform a lecture hall into a large-scale discussion, produce a graph reflecting the data of a class poll, and even entice students to attend class by serving as an attendance sheet. But the PRS system has one other notorious feature we have all come to recognize.

Stalling class.

"Let's try this," said Raymond La Raja, professor of political science, placing a question on the projector screen. Buttons click and remotes are pointed toward the receiver boxes hung on the walls. Suddenly, the high-speed computer system slows to an agonizing crawl. The numbers that register each student transmitter aren't showing up and the class shuffles restlessly.

"I'm just doing what the company told me to do," says La Raja in an exasperated tone.

It's another happy day at the innovative school of high-class technology — the University of Massachusetts. Does this scene sound familiar? According to most of the grumbling heard in lecture halls, students are becoming fed up with shoddy technology. Granted, the University provides its students with many wonderful technological advances that have great potential to improve the quality of our education — if the University would give them the support they need. At the top of the list is the PRS system.

The PRS system, provided by EduCue, is one of the most innovative systems for enhanced learning provided to us at UMass. In the large-scale lecture halls that are common to a school of this size, it is often impossible to encourage class participation. Students are reluctant to voice their opinions in front of hundreds of people, and many are uncomfortable just raising their hand to vote in a class poll.

By analyzing student answers into a series of graphs and charts, the PRS system provides an opportunity for professors to get student feedback on their understanding of the material, as well as providing a comfortable area to pit their opinions against those of their 200 fellow lecture hall mates. However, some students are not impressed.

"It takes too long," said Lauren Franks, a freshman student. "I don't think it should be used for class participation. If you want to participate, just raise your hand and talk."

Student satisfaction with the system as an educational tool is also dropping. According to a poll taken by Richard Rogers, faculty advisor to the provost and professor of resource economics, student satisfaction with the PRS system as a learning tool has dropped from 90 percent to 75 percent in the last five years.

"I think some of the novelty may have worn off," said Rogers.

Despite the amount of student criticism the system receives, the PRS system is actually enhancing our quality of classroom education. A recent grant by the Davis Education Foundation has also helped UMass to continue installing the technology.

However, in order to perform at its full potential the PRS system needs help from the University itself — financial support. In the face of budget cuts, UMass is working to expand itself by increasing in size. However, bigger is not necessarily better. Administrators seem to be losing site of the assets the campus already possesses. At the cost of $2,000 per lecture hall, the PRS system seems like a horrible — and expensive — thing to waste.

"The PRS system is still in an exploratory phase," said Rogers, who was the first professor to implement the PRS system in his classroom. Rogers says many professors do not have the time or the technological knowledge to understand the system in depth. This translates to wasted class time — and ultimately increasing the drain on University funds.

"I think [PRS use] is an awesome idea," said La Raja. La Raja said he has noticed an increase in class participation since he began using the PRS system this year. "It would be nice if UMass gave us a bit more support," said La Raja. "I'm still learning and right now it's pretty much sink or swim."

Although Rogers' Web page on The Center for Teaching Web site does include some support information, the burden of mastering the complicated technology ultimately falls on the shoulders of the professors. Technological glitches such as receiver box or computer failure can pop up unexpectedly. It can sometimes take several minutes for La Raja to fix a computer problem, which causes his class time to be wasted.

"If someone could sit with me for first two or three classes ... and show me how [PRS] works, it would minimize wasted time for both students and for me," said La Raja.

Sadly, the PRS system is just another example of UMass attempting to implement a great opportunity for its students, but never helping the opportunity reach its full potential. Rather than planning to build new dorms when others are in dire need of repair, or planning to admit more students when classrooms are already overcrowded, the University needs to focus on improving the positive features it already possesses. By improving the quality of our current assets, the quality of a UMass education will improve overall.

America's new war front

Thomas Naughton

I should have been on "American Gladiators." My gladiator name would have been "Bones," being the only skinny warrior of the bunch. While Lazer and Zap could flex their anabolically-enhanced musculature, my keen hunger for blood would kick in when in the midst of a challenger, inspiring me to pounce him/her and gnaw on their bones like a rabid dog. No "Eliminator" for them.

Why am I sure of my ability as an incensed marauder of the holy order of all that is cardio? Because I have braved the evil trenches, fought off the demons and dodged the disgusting offspring of vermin in a place that can only be referred to as "the gym." People talk about having "gym rage," a syndrome of the avid gym-goer that manifests itself in gritted teeth, clenched fists and stern warnings of "get off that bike before I EAT YOU."

A similar condition exists for me, but I refer to it as Gym Conquest. People with the "rage" just look mean — I divide and conquer. I have had to; I've been walked on, lifted out and balance-ball-bounced off many gym apparatuses. I had reached the point of no return.

I decided after a particularly upsetting incident with an old man and a stair stepper (in which I lost) that the time for being nice, calm and collected was over. I had become Crouching Street Runner, Hidden Machine-Hog Killer. If you see my face when you walk into a gym, run away, or keep your distance, because I'm ruthless and I mean business.

I am an exercise addict.

I'm OK with it. I go to the gym five times a week on top of running 50-70 miles on the street. It's an addiction that borders on unhealthy some weeks, but exercise centers me and calms me down, except when I go to the gym.

When I'm at home, I go to the YMCA in my town instead of the World's Gym to dodge people I went to high school with. World's Gym is home to all the boys from my school who are not in jail, or whom are not in an advanced stage of "perma-high" resulting from hourly use of cheap suburb-weed. Anytime I see the majority of my classmates, I have to quell the overwhelming urge to set myself on fire with a combination of old prescription drugs that stand by like vigilant soldiers in my parent's linen closet.

There are four types of gym-goers: the Liftin' Boys, the Baby Weight Women, the Strange and Terrible Elderly, and me — Captain of the S.S. Touch My Treadmill and You're Dead. I love them. I have dated them. Liftin' Boys come in all shapes and sizes, but they share one commonality: they think that bicep girth equals the status of "I'm Wicked Jacked, Dude." The advent of "I'm Wicked Jacked, Dude" to the boys who pursue it means fame, fortune, good looks and their first pick of any orange-skinned girl from Southwest or a sorority.

There are four types of gym-goers: the Liftin' Boys, the Baby Weight Women, the Strange and Terrible Elderly, and me — Captain of the S.S. Touch My Treadmill and You're Dead.

Their arms are big, some quite big, but for most of these boys, the rest of their figure remains untouched by any form of exercise, their beer guts hanging proud in a sheath of a Hooter's T-shirt. There are Liftin' Boys at our own school, we see them in the gym getting Wicked Jacked, or in the dining commons eating a dozen hard-boiled eggs and a slab of raw beef to fuel their all-important arms.

The Strange and Terrible Elderly are just that — strange and terrible. The elderly women look at me, a young man in his 20s, as the symbol for all that is wrong with the world, simply because they can and want to. It could be worse for me though, if I was African-American at my hometown YMCA, the elderly woman would probably have me removed citing rap music as a reason that I am dangerous.

We now travel to the locker room, the metal-door jungle. Steam billows over our heads, the sound of faucets and air dryers fills the cement halls. Suddenly, we are being stalked on our safari, its too late, the predator has us in his sights, and when we turn around we will not be able to escape the encounter with the Strange and Terrible Old Man and his uncovered testicles. No matter what locker room I venture into there is always one old man walking around with his testicles boldly hanging out for the entire world to see. When outside the arena of a sexual encounter or a look down at myself in the shower to make sure I didn't get my business caught in my zipper and forgot about it, I need to be significantly prepared to see male genitals, and even more thoroughly prepared to see the effects of aging on the aforementioned body part. The starkest and most haunting thing about this species of the gym-goer is their blind conceit; they truly do not realize that their low-hanging hammock is offending anyone else.

The most dangerous and cunning of the gym-goers is by far the Baby Weight Women. These women have had it with the world. They have gotten pregnant, gained weight while being assaulted by images of thin women in the media, and they have given birth to their ingrate child or children and all they got were some lousy stretch marks. They're mad as hell and they're not going to take it anymore. Not only do most of these women not know how to use gym equipment, they don't want to know, and I can't blame them. They don't want to be looking at terse old women or smell my sweaty armpits next to them on a treadmill. Their smug demeanor, however does not scare me and neither does their mismatched leotard outfit.

I go to the gym for one reason, the elliptical trainer. It burns a lot of calories in a short amount of time and I usually put it on the highest level setting and cross-country ski as fast as I can for 50 minutes, transcending this plain of existence in favor of the anaerobic astral plane that usually causes me to vomit discreetly in the bathroom after the session is over. If you come in between me and the elliptical trainer, you're dead.

Before I even go to the gym, I have usually gone running for an hour or more, so my endorphins are pulsing to the drumbeat of my heart. The Baby Weight Women never understand the elliptical trainer. There are two kinds, one with the arms that I use, and one that just works your legs. If you are using one with the arms, you better use the arm pieces, or I'll kick you off. I'm serious.

One woman made this mistake once. She stole the elliptical machine from me, which was her first mistake, she saw that I was preparing to use it. She blatantly cut me off and proceeded to neglect the arm-pieces, enraging me. I asked her if she would mind using one of the legs-only machines and she gave me a look of death.

I thought to myself, "OK, Mother-of-Four, I'll just go out to the parking lot and key every minivan and I'm sure I'll have gotten you back for this." I made my way for the door when all of a sudden I heard her fall off. She uttered some obscenities and stormed over to the bubbler.

I had been reunited with my lover and grinned garishly at Mother-of-Four as I did what she could not: conquer the gym.

Surviving yet again

Ryan Aubert

Back in the summer of 2000, there was one show that was all the rage on television with everybody chatting about whether Richard, Rudy, Kelly, or Sue would win the big million-dollar prize. The premise for the show was simple enough: 16 people were dropped off on a tropical island with no food, no fire, no cappuccino machine and no Internet. Yes, these crazy Americans were actually roughing it. Every three days these urban "savages" would vote each other off the island in a ritualistic dissing until there was only one contestant left.

Responsible for the reality-television boom, the first "Survivor" was a huge hit and has spun off seven sequels. "Survivor: All-Stars" is the latest incarnation and although not the best season, it has been very amusing so far.

The thing about "All-Stars" is that every contestant is a "Survivor" alumnus. Every season is represented from the original "Borneo" (or "Pulau Tiga") to the most recent "Pearl Islands." Only the most popular and interesting characters were asked to return. Thus, a multitude of survivors appear on screen from the "Australian Outback" and "Marquesas" (widely considered to be the best of the spin-offs).

There is the return of everybody's favorite naked gay man and original survivor: Richard Hatch. Hatch was voted off in the fifth episode after the other survivors realized a good strategy was to vote off previous winners, since they already won their million bucks (wow, they are actually smart this time around!) Other winners Tina Wesson ("Australian Outback") and Ethan Zohn ("Africa") were also sent packing. Jenna Morasca, winner of "The Amazon" left after deciding that she needed to be with her ailing mother.

Speaking of leaving, Sue Hawk left the game in episode six, many viewers are still perplexed as to why she took the boat out of there. Hawk is the very outspoken truck-

The Rock walks into stereotypical action hero roll

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

I must confess to liking Dwayne Johnson — the former pro-wrestler better known as the Rock — as an actor. He's not a great one (at least not yet) but he's one possessed of the charisma and presence of a born star. He's being postioned as our official new action demigod, which sounds about right; unlike his precursors, who were stolid, monolithic slabs of granite, Johnson brings a certain quiet thoughtfulness to his roles. He's the action hero who is also a soulful sensitive-guy warrior. If only his movies were as equally compelling.

"Walking Tall" is the kind of rundown, junk head-smasher that you could imagine the old guard (your basic Schwarzenneggers, Stallones and Van Dammes) making in the late 1980s. It's actually a remake (of a 1973 drama starring Joe Don Baker) but it's not too dissimilar from the Rock's other films, the awful swords-and-sandals campfests of not so long ago; "The Scorpion King" and last year's "The Rundown." Like those films, "Walking Tall" has the musty, dilapidated feel of something buried in an attic.

The movie opens with a title card that says it's "inspired by a true story," but it's one of those movies in which "inspired by" could — and should be — replaced with "exploited from." The actual tale (it was the basis of the original movie) is that of Buford Pusser, a Southern man who was elected Sheriff in his small Tennessee town and used his position to single-handedly rid his town of corruption.

In the new "Walking Tall," the action has been set in the photogenic Pacific Northwest, which allows from some very pretty shots of very pretty pine forests. Pusser has been renamed Chris Vaughn (what big-screen star would actually play a character named Buford?), and he's now a soldier returning back home to find that the old lumber mill has closed but a guady, neon casino has opened in its stead.

"Walking Tall"
Directed by Kevin Bray
Starring The Rock, Johnny Knoxville, MGM
87 mins.
Grade C

How do we know that Jay Hamilton (Neal McDonough) the casino owner and an old high school rival of Chris' is the bad guy? He's impeccably dressed, with an icy blue glare out of the Paul Newman School and the sharkish smug grin of a suburban-scum car salesman. He pals around with thick-necked goons (Chris' pals are flannel-shirted "average" dudes.) He also looks like the world's first metrosexual yuppie jock; he's too conventionally pretty to be anything more than the smirking corporate villain.

The director, Kevin Bray, at least keeps things moving swiftly. Chris returns home; Chris antagonizes Jay and his lackeys; Chris gets elected sheriff and metes out justice with the assist of a large wooden club. "Walking Tall" clocks in at a lean 82 minutes, which means that Bray has carved off most of the fat. The problem is, most of the meat is gone too.

There isn't much of a plot here — it's more like an excuse to string together a series of brutal (but PG-13 safe) beatings. The Rock punches, kicks and uses a 2x4 to womp the unlucky faceless extras. It would be nice to say that you can revel in watching the Rock do what he does best, but these fights aren't anything that hasn't been hit before. The characters seem to exist solely as props, and they include Chris' biracial family and the sexy blonde looker (Ashley Scott) who acts as the token love interest and seems to exist to let teenage boys ogle her as she stands in a red bra shooting a gun.

"Walking Tall" is as flat and generic as an action film can be; one wishes that it had a little more ingenuity, or was at least less competently made to triumph as a bad-movie goof. This time, even the Rock goes down with the ship. But Johnny Knoxville, as Chris' loyal comic relief best friend, manages to rise above the material. Knoxville, the idiot-boy leader of the "Jackass" crew, may forever be known as the guy who willfully underwent ritual torture (taser gun experiments, baby alligator nipple clamps, etc.) in the name of comedy. But he's a charismatic scene-stealer himself, and the only one who helps make "Walking Tall" stand a little taller.

Rock's scarier side

'Horror' a bit lost on new CDs

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

Psychobilly n.: An eclectic genre of music — a combination of rockabilly, horror punk, punk, goth rock, blues and bluegrass; old-school rockabilly meets punk.

That's as good a definition as any to sum up the singularly unique punk subculture known as Psychobilly, a kind of dirtied up rockabilly swing, spliced with sneering punk 'tude. And it is as good a definition as any to sum up "Hell Yeah!" the appealing Hellcat debut of Danish psychos Horrorpops.

Horrorpops
'Hell Yeah!'
Hellcat/Epitaph

Don't be scared by the sizable amount of tattoos and blood-spattered imagery that the band employs in their music; there is not that much "psycho" to their "billy." Though the Horrorpops' four members (and their two loyal go-go dancers Mille and Kamilla) look appropriately grody enough with their blocky tattoos, abundant piercings and insanely structured and colored hair, there is nothing scary about their music. The breezy, rocking pop tunes here owe more to SoCal darlings No Doubt (in their ska-punking early years) than the horror imagery suggests, another band that is more show than go.

Oh there's plenty of ghoulish references found throughout "Hell Yeah!," the allusions to monsters and cannibals are of course more metaphorical than literal (thank God for small favors.) But the music itself has the kind of boppy, bouncy giddiness that's perfect for an open-topped Convertible drive.

The songs veer between punk, ska, swing, surf, and even '50s-style rock 'n' roll (on "Dotted With Hearts," which comes complete with a Roy Orbison sound-alike on the interlude.) There's no shortage of glistening pop hooks here, either: "Julia," "Miss Take," "Girl in A Cage" and "Drama Queen" all frontload the album with nagging memorable harmonies, that stick to one's brain with their contemporary-ness. It is the kind of spunky, punky gaiety that Gwen Stefani and her crew indulged in before they discovered their now hallmark pop sheen. (Heck, even their lead singer sounds like a throatier version of Stefani's kewpie doll vocals.)

There are a few too many filler songs here to call "Hell Yeah!" anything more than a solidly made showcase for the band ... but then who would resist the tribal-beat drums that kick "Psychobitches Outta Hell"? I can't even see anyone resisting once they drop "Hell Yeah!" into their stereo.

It can be a blessing for a band to have a killer song smack dab in the middle of an album — unless of course that killer song sucks the life out of every other song around it. That is what has happened to Welsh hard rockers the Lostprohets on their sophomore release "Start Something" in which the hooky single "Last Train Home" looms like a monolith over the rest of the album's tracks, consigning them to instant forgetability.

Listening to "Start Something" you realize exactly what Lostprohets are: a reasonably solid, tight radio-rock outfit that spins songs that would fit snugly on a modern rock formatted FM station. They are to Hoobastank what that band is to Incubus as that band was to the Red Hot Chili Peppers, though after all the watered down refinements, the funk is almost totally bled out of the music of the LostProphets. Yep, the band is that generic, though the craftsmanship is still concrete enough to (almost) forget that insurmountable problem. Except that the relatively listenable fodder that makes up the album — the kind of "emotional" soft-hard rock fit for chore work — is universally eclipsed by the appeal of "Last Train Home," who's dual choruses will leave instant imprints in your mind. It's hard to listen to the other songs without being reminded of the boring samey-ness of it all. The guys of Lostprophets may have just accidentally turned themselves into one-hit wonders.

Art: more than just obsession

High art and high order as tribute to OCD

CLIFTON SUZUKI/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Boston artist Nancy Havlick installs her artwork, "Sugar Egg Rug," at the Boston Center for the Arts in Boston as part of the exhibit "OCD," as in obsessive compulsive disorder.

By Helena Payne
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — A Boston artist has dedicated a museum exhibit to the type of behavior that causes some to separate their M&Ms into colors, pop bubble wrap until there is no more plastic to crush and focus all their attention on the most minute detail out of pure obsession.

The exhibit at the Boston Center for the Arts is called "OCD," as in obsessive compulsive disorder. Curator Matthew Nash said it's not about an illness, but how the creative process can be driven by a series of obsessions and compulsions.

"You should see my studio," said Nash, who has shown his art in Boston, Chicago, New York and Italy.

He is one of the people who separates his Skittles, M&Ms and Reese's Pieces into separate containers for each color. He used the latter two sugary goods to create his art for the OCD exhibit, which lasts through May 9 and features artists from New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia and Pennsylvania.

Using the Halloween-like colors in the candies, Nash made a grid that forms the images of soldiers, planes and other war-related pictures.

"The obsession of this is having bins and bins of M&Ms and hoping when you're done it looks like something," Nash said.

Nancy Havlick has bins with objects separated by color, but they're filled with sugar eggs. In an attempt to fuse her multicultural roots — English and Armenian — with her American upbringing, she decided to start her own tradition.

With the sugar eggs, Havlick creates "rugs." Make no mistake, they aren't to walk on.

The eggs are colored with a mixture of spices and foods often used in Armenia, including mahleb, sumac, almonds, apricots, paprika and rosebuds. She organizes them in decorative patterns on the floor.

"I'm deciding my own tradition. Rather than looking backwards, I'm forging ahead," Havlick said, laying one of the eggs in its position.

Havlick said she didn't recognize her obsession with making sugar eggs until she realized she has been doing it for a decade. But she has also realized another fixation: carving out an identity from her multiethnic past.

In her parents' generation, Havlick said, it was much more common to assimilate to the American culture rather than celebrate differences.

"My mother wasn't cooking Armenian food. We were having hot dogs and hamburgers," she said.

The sugar eggs have become her own way of bridging the past to the future and "to control the chaotic feelings" of life, she said. And for her two children, the sugar egg tradition is working. Her 9-month-old son Jonathan's first words were "momma," "sugar" and "eggs."

Many of the exhibitors wanted their art to express something about both the creation process and the result.

New York artist Jason Dean wanted to conquer bubble wrap after working for an animation company where he did a lot of packing.

So he decided to make It an art project and see how much time it would take for him to pop the largest roll of bubble wrap he could find: 110 feet by 4 feet. It took about six hours.

That roll and other smaller ones are mounted on a wall of the exhibit like paper towels above a kitchen sink. There is also a video that features Dean's "popping spree."

"I kept thinking that they were a lot louder," he said. "It just sounded like fireworks and I kept thinking that someone is going to question this odd sound."

Joseph Trupia, another New York artist, used office supplies to make drawings called "What I can do In 40 hours" and "What I can do in 8 hours."

Another work in the OCD exhibit shows 600 photographs of rear ends.

"It was kind of a silly thing to do at first and it became a document of the process of looking," said Boston artist Luke Walker of his gluteus photography.

Norfolk, Va., artist Jennifer Schmidt became fascinated with the repetition of filling in ovals on test score sheets.

"The idea of the artwork showing evidence of repeated activity is something we see in a lot of different forms," said Martha Buskirk, a fellow at the Sterling and Francine Clark Art Institute in Williamstown, Mass., and author of "The Contingent Object of Contemporary Art."

The clinical disorder is even more consuming, said Diane Davey, a registered nurse and program director of the OCD Institute at McLean Hospital in Belmont.

"Obsessive compulsive disorder is really defined as someone who has unwanted or disturbing intrusive thoughts and who engages in a set of behaviors that are meant to sort of neutralize the thought and help them to feel less anxious," Davey said.

Davey said an exhibit like "OCD" might help someone to question his or her own behavior and seek help if necessary.

Rockapella tuning up UMass

If you grew up watching PBS, you undoubtedly remember the theme song from the TV show "Where In The World Is Carmen San Diego?" from the a cappella quintet, Rockapella.

Formed in the 1980s in nearby Providence, R.I., the group started as a quartet of alumni from Brown University. They made their way to New York City where they performed on street corners as well as at private parties and clubs. In the early 1990s, Rockapella performed on "Spike and Co.: Do It A Cappella," a highly praised PBS show that featured many of the best a cappella groups in the country.

In 1992 the group hired Jeff Thacher, a vocal percussionist, who helped give Rockapella its distinct sound with his mouth drumming ability. Shortly thereafter, the group was hired by PBS to do "Where In The World Is Carmen San Diego?"

The group consists of members, George Baldi, Elliott Kerman, Scott Leonard, Jeff Thacher and Kenneth Wright. Rockapella's sound has evolved over the years and is considered to be at the peak of their careers with the five members' vocal skills sharpened and in control.

Rockapella has many original songs, but also covers a range of pop and classic rock songs. They have performed covers of songs by Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers, Dave Matthews Band and Queen as well as performing theme songs such as the "Mission Impossible" theme and the theme from the Pink Panther. With a mixture of good songs and a unique sound as well as Rockapella's well-known humorous onstage wit, it promises to be a great show.

Rockapella is sponsored by FM 93.9 The River, Florence Savings Bank, Health New England and Hampshire Hospitality Group. Tickets are $7 – $25. For tickets and information, call the Fine Arts Center Box office at 413-545-2511 or 1-800-999-UMAS, or go online at www.fineartscenter.com/centerseries.

er, and tough women from the original show. She seemed to be the last person that would be upset by a naked Hatch rubbing up against her as a joke during one of the challenges. However, she was uncharacteristically emotional afterwards and in her own words felt "violated." She subsequently left the show, leaving viewers asking themselves whether she was genuinely upset or was just looking to capitalize on the event by suing Hatch after the show was over. The world may never know.

Who will win? It's tough to say, and it really depends on who gets immunity and when. Both Lex van der Berghe ("Africa") and "Boston" Rob Mariano ("Marquesas") are playing the game really well this time around, manipulating everybody they come in contact with. However, other players are starting to become aware of this and may vote them off sooner than expected. Others are flying under the radar such as Shii Ann Huang ("Thailand") and Jenna Lewis ("Borneo"). If I were a betting man, I would put my chips on either Kathy Vavrick-O'Brien ("Marquesas") or Rupert Boneham ("Pearl Islands"). They have a good shot at winning simply because they are both likeable folks, both by the survivors and the viewers.

Starter Scott Hampe took the loss for Holy Cross (3-14-1) after giving up seven hits and five earned runs while striking out six in seven innings of work.

Trailing 5-3 entering the bottom of the eighth, Twomley led off the inning with a tremendous home-run off the façade of the Mullins Center Practice Rink to cut the deficit to one. Following an out, sophomore catcher Frank Curreri doubled to left and advanced to third on a wild third strike to senior first baseman Matt Reynolds, who also reached on the play to set up a first-and-third situation for the Minutemen with one out.

Szado then followed with a three-run homer down the right field line, knocking Hampe from the game and putting UMass back out in front.

"[The homerun] was huge," Stone said. "It really got us going at that point and it was enough for us to eventually win the game."

Things did not go well for junior closer Scott Ratliff in the top of the ninth inning, however, as the southpaw retired two batters but issued three walks in the process and was lifted in favor of freshman Devin Barnett.

Faced with a bases-loaded, two-out scenario, Barnett posted a strikeout on three pitches to earn his first collegiate save and give the Maroon and White their second consecutive win.

The teams combined for eight early runs on a myriad of sloppy plays over the first six innings. UMass jumped out in front 3-0 in the first on an error, a sacrifice fly and an RBI groundout, while the Crusaders tied the game off Torra in the third with a trio of runs on a pair of hits and an error.

The Cross then grabbed the lead off of junior righthander Mike Crane in the fifth inning, posting a single run on a pair of hits and two wild pitches. Sophomore Jeremy Demers was then victimized by a similiar fate, coughing up a run on a pair of hits and a wild pitch in the sixth.

it up, with Schill and then the bullpen coming in," Francona said. "Because we didn't hit the ball and we left some runners on base, it's great to win a game like that."

Baltimore starter Eric DuBose (0-1) allowed three runs, four hits and a career-high six walks in 5 1-3 innings. He wasn't terrible, but not nearly good enough to compete with Schilling.

"He's one of the best pitchers in the game, and you can't expect your offense to get a whole lot off him," DuBose said. "You've got to keep their offense down as long as possible and hope you get a chance to win late in the game."

Kevin Millar homered for the Red Sox, who received eight walks and made the most of five hits.

Luis Matos had two hits and drove in the lone run for the Orioles, who were seeking to build on their opening win over Pedro Martinez. Baltimore newcomers Miguel Tejada, Rafael Palmeiro and Javy Lopez, who combined to go 7-for-11 in that game, went 2-for-11 in this one.

Credit Schilling for that.

"No question, you have your hands full," Mazzilli said. "He had good stuff, and it seemed like he was always ahead in the count."

Boston took advantage of a wild streak by DuBose to go up 2-0 in the second. Manny Ramirez drew a leadoff walk and reached third before DuBose slipped on the mound and hurled a pitch that sailed far over the head of the catcher, allowing Ramirez to score. Jason Varitek followed with an RBI single.

Millar made it 3-0 in the fourth, driving a 3-2 pitch into the left-field seats.

Baltimore broke through in the fifth. After Larry Bigbie hit a one-out single and came around on a double by Matos, Schilling avoided further damage by retiring Brian Roberts and Melvin Mora on fly balls.

Boston added an unearned run in the ninth on Mora's second error of the game and third of the season at third base.

Schilling gives Red Sox viable second option

was the piece of mind Schilling offered the Fenway Faithful; definitive reassurance that while Pedro will likely continue to piss and moan and float fastballs through what may be his final hurrah in Beantown, there will still be a rock in the Sox rotation that will, more times than not, deliver a win every fifth day.

Beyond that, it also means that if Martinez ever gets his act together — as myself and many others believe he will — the Red Sox will easily have one of the more dominant one-two punches in the game. On the other hand if he doesn't, then Schilling will serve as reason 1A why Pedro will be offered the first ticket out of town.

There is no longer any question as to whether Boston is now a two-horse town. Curt Schilling has arrived, and as much as the organization will assure its fans and supporters that Martinez is the ace of a staff with championship aspirations, it appears as if that may be in title only.

For seven years now, Martinez has gone unchallenged as not only the top pitcher in the Hub, but in all of baseball as well. However the times have changed, and even a devoted Martinez supporter like myself has to admit that he is not the same pitcher who blew away the National League in the 1998 All-Star Game, or tossed five innings of no-hit relief in the 1999 American League Division Series.

He has become a finesse pitcher, cutting fastballs and running change-ups to compensate for eighth miles per hour on his fastball that seemingly went AWOL a few years back. His fragile body has not proven it can hold up over 162 games, and his fiery temper couldn't even make it through Game 1 without drilling good pal David Segui between the shoulder blades out of frustration.

Despite all this, Martinez is still a great pitcher. His sheer desire to compete every time out dispels the notion that his ego or his temper gets in the way, because he is a prideful man who wants nothing more than to win at all costs.

However for the first time in his career, Pedro Martinez is sharing a rotation with a pitcher of his caliber, and while the Nation eagerly awaits the next starts of each of its pair of aces, the pressure is squarely on the shoulders of No. 45.

Curt Schilling has done his part. He has gone out, taken his turn behind Martinez in the rotation and earned a victory for his team. For the first time in memory, the Sox no longer have to string together the days between Pedro starts, nor cater to his every scratch, bruise and bellyache because Curt Schilling has taken away his bargaining chip of being the sole life force of the Red Sox staff.

So as Red Sox Nation enjoys what should be the first of many Curt Schilling victories, the gauntlet has unofficially been thrown down. The time to put up or shut up is here, and if Pedro is unwilling to simply do his thing for the good of the team, then his replacement has already been found.

Maroon and White rallies to down Holy Cross in belated home opener

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

And then there was sunshine.

Having seen numerous attempts to play its 2004 home opener postponed due to rain and soggy field conditions, the Massachusetts baseball team finally stepped onto Earl Lorden Field yesterday afternoon and opened it's home slate on a positive note, downing in-state rival Holy Cross 8-5.

With the win, the Maroon and White improved to 8-7 on the season.

Holy Cross	5

With his squad seeing its first action in a week, coach Mike Stone utilized nine pitchers in all and received a game-winning three-run homerun from junior left fielder Curt Szado as the Minutemen overcame an eight-inning deficit to climb back above .500 at 8-7.

Hitting out of the leadoff spot, junior rightfielder Jason Twomley homered and drove in two runs, while sophomore centerfielder Derrick Durepo also had a pair of hits and scored a run.

Senior ace Eric Chown was the only Minuteman hurler to work multiple innings, as the Atlanta Braves draft pick started and worked a pair of scoreless innings, surrendering three hits and striking out two.

Sophomore righthander Matt Torra was roughed up in an inning of work, coughing up two hits and three runs — two of which were earned — while classmate David Sullivan earned his first victory of the season and of his career with a scoreless eighth inning of relief.

"We had to get our guys ready for the weekend," Stone said. "We haven't played in a week and we had the opportunity to get a lot of guys some work, and it came out

Thornton set to go for Bruins

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON – Joe Thornton skated with his teammates and smiled afterward.

All that was missing Tuesday was a knowing wink when the Boston Bruins' best player parroted the team's party line that no decision had been made on whether he will play in the playoff opener. His teammates, though, liked what they saw.

"Joe looks great," Brian Rolston said. "He's had a few days off now to rest and I think he should be ready."

The Bruins, seeded second in the Eastern Conference, open their first-round series against the seventh-seeded Montreal Canadiens on Wednesday night. Thornton was hurt last Thursday night and missed Boston's last two regular-season games Saturday and Sunday against New Jersey.

Coach Mike Sullivan didn't waver Tuesday from his statement that Thornton has an "upper body injury." Thornton, perhaps concerned an opponent would target the specific injured area, said "the upper body feels great," then laughed.

Thornton was hurt against the Washington Capitals after taking a slash to his right wrist and falling hard on the ice.

Speculation has centered on his wrist or ribs as the injured part of his upper body.

The rib theory gained credence with one of Thornton's remarks after Tuesday's practice.

"The pain I don't think will be a problem," he said. "Just to see if I can actually go out there and move the way I want to move and things like that is a greater uncertainty."

Might he be wearing something extra to protect the injured area?

"I wouldn't tell you if I did," he said with a smile.

Thornton said he wants to play and Sullivan wants to see how he recovers Wednesday morning from Tuesday's practice.

"He's doing OK and we'll make a decision" Wednesday, Sullivan said. "He looked pretty good to me."

Asked if he expected Thornton to play, Sullivan just said, "We'll make that decision tomorrow." Thornton said that after Saturday's game in Boston consideration was given by the coaches to him playing Sunday in New Jersey.

"They decided just to keep me back here and just work on it a little bit," he said. "It worked out good and they didn't need me."

The Bruins won 3-1 to clinch the Northeast Division title and the No. 2 seed in the conference. Since he last played, "I feel a lot better," Thornton said. "Everything feels pretty good."

He led the Bruins with 33 goals and 50 assists this season and missed just five games.

"He's one of the elite players in our league," Montreal defenseman Sheldon Souray said. "But they played their last two games without him and they beat New Jersey pretty handily in their last game."

The Bruins won the season series 3-2-1, but four games went to overtime and they outscored Montreal just 9-7. And the Canadiens had two wins in Boston.

In their last playoff meeting in 2002, eighth-seeded Montreal got great goaltending from Jose Theodore and upset top-seeded Boston in the first round. Boston has won only seven of the 29 playoff series between the teams.

"There's so great a rivalry there (that) the records in the regular season really mean nothing now," Boston's Ted Donato said.

Like Theodore two years ago, Boston's Andrew Raycroft is in his first season as a No. 1 goalie and is a leading candidate for rookie of the year.

Raycroft had 29 wins and a 2.05 goals against average in 57 games. Theodore won 33 games with a 2.27 goals against average in 67 games.

The Bruins gave up the third fewest goals in the Eastern Conference and improved their defense with in-season acquisitions Sergei Gonchar and Jiri Slegr.

"They're going to try to take away our space," said Mike Ribeiro, who led Montreal with 63 points, "but we have a lot of guys on a lot of lines that can put the puck in the net."

And Raycroft will be the last line of defense.

He's approaching the game "the same way I have the last 82 games. It seemed to work for me," he said. "I'm more excited than anything else."

Arnold, Busa overcome bitter Cambridge weather to lead Minutewomen past Harvard in doubleheader

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

After spending the early part of the season in more tropical climates in Arizona and Florida, the Massachusetts softball team has returned to bitter reality: the New England weather.

The Minutewomen fought through the bitter conditions in Cambridge to take a doubleheader yesterday over Harvard, 7-2 and 2-1.

UMass' featured pitching duo, Kelli Arnold and Jenna Busa, continued their success on the mound despite the unfriendly pitching situation. Arnold extended her unearned run streak to 29 and 1/3 innings, as Busa ended her own streak at 31 innings after giving up a homerun to Cecily Gordon in the sixth.

Busa started the opening contest and improved to 9-5 on the year with a 7-2 victory. The reigning Atlantic 10 Pitcher of the Week scattered six hits, two walks, four strikeouts and two earned runs. The veteran, Arnold, had five strikeouts and gave up only three hits, one walk and one unearned run. The junior/sophomore combo has only let one run cross the plate, earned or unearned, since winning the Blue and Gold title on March 14 in Miami.

"Our pitching ability brings us stability," UMass head coach Elaine Sortino said. "I feel they both pitched well considering the conditions. It's terrible out here, so cold and windy. Kelli [Arnold] really stepped up today turning down the heart of the order and pitched a solid game.

I think Jenna pitched a little erratic today. She gave up only three hits and unfortunately two were homeruns, but she still pitched a pretty good game."

Contributing to the hurlers' effort, four different players in Maroon and White managed a homerun, as the team had 21 hits in the doubleheader. In game one, junior Pam Sulick ignited a second inning rally with the first homer of the day, a solo shot to right center, as junior Hilary Puglia had first roundtripper of season in the fourth.

An unlike combo, sophomore K.J. Kelley and junior Denise Denis, produced the only UMass runs of the second game. In the fourth inning, Kelley started hot at the plate and blasted a shot to left, her tenth homerun of the year. Denis went back-to-back sending one over the right field fence, her first career homerun. The junior outfielder's milestone knock turned out to be the difference maker as Harvard scored on an error to cut the lead to one. Puglia managed to convert three consecutive grounders to end the threat of a comeback.

"I said it in the beginning of the season and I still believe this is the best hitting team we have ever had," Sortino said. "All our kids can hit and a lot can run and that gives multiple ways of producing runs. Though you will never see this team swinging for the fence, because I don't believe in that."

Senior K.C. Budrewicz followed the homer with a shot to right field that caught up in the wind and allowed Budrewicz to leg out the triple. Freshman Amanda Morin capitalized on the scoring opportunity, singling to left field to bring home Morin.

UMass added four runs in the fourth to extend their lead. Sophomore Kristen Stefanoni and Morin hit back-to-back double to start things off, as Morin scored on Stefanoni's double. After Stefanoni crossed the plate on a wild pitch, Puglia sent a two-run shot to left and gave the Minutewomen commanding 6-0 lead heading into the fifth.

After senior Aisha Franke added a seventh run, the Crimson added a pair of homeruns in the two final frames. Overlooking Busa's late inning mishaps, Sortino feels her sophomore pitcher will only improve.

"Jenna is finally starting to realize what she can do with the ball and that's part of the experience she didn't have three weeks ago," Sortino said. "She's developed a good change-up and has a great curveball. As she emerges, I think she's only going to get better and get more batters swinging."

Schilling to the rescue

Righthander leads Red Sox to first victory

By David Ginsburg
Associated Press

BALTIMORE – Pitching in the World Series and dozens of other important games couldn't prevent Curt Schilling from feeling jittery as he prepared for his first start with the Boston Red Sox.

Red Sox	4
Orioles	1

"I was nervous all day. That's just the way I am," he said. "More so today than normal, but I expected that."

Assigned the task of preventing Boston from falling to 0-2 for the first time since 1996, Schilling allowed one run in six innings to lead the Red Sox past the Baltimore Orioles 4-1 Tuesday.

It was the first win with the Red Sox for manager Terry Francona, and Lee Mazzilli's initial loss as manager of the Orioles.

Boston's decision to pick Schilling in the 1986 amateur draft finally paid off – 18 years later. Obtained in a trade with Arizona in November, the right-hander got the Red Sox back on track following Sunday's opening-night loss to Baltimore.

"This was different today in a lot of ways," said Schilling, now in his 14th major league season. "It's a different environment, there are a lot of expectations, and you want to live up to them the best you can."

Schilling (1-0) yielded six hits, struck out seven and walked one in earning his second career victory in the AL — the first since 1990, when he was with the Orioles. He spent parts of three seasons in Baltimore after being traded from Boston with Brady Anderson in July 1988 for Mike Boddicker.

After throwing 109 pitches and staking the Red Sox to a 3-1 lead, Schilling was ordered to watch the remainder of the game from the dugout.

"He lobbied a little bit, but it wasn't one of his stronger lobbies," Francona said. "The whole idea is for him to feel strong in August and September, for us to win, and for him to pitch effectively."

Alan Embree and Mike Timlin each worked one inning and Keith Foulke got three outs for his first save with Boston.

"That's kind of how you draw

Senate: DC polling stations must stay open

By Melissa Blankstein
Collegian Staff

The thrown out Student Government Association elections continued to be a main focus of the SGA Senate last night, with the Senate passing a motion that all dining commons polling stations must remain open during the next election, scheduled for April 28 and 29.

The decision means it is likely one of the Campus Center polling stations will be closed due to a shortage of elections workers.

Interim President Jared Nokes told the Senate that in the Judiciary's ruling on the last election, justices said all four dining commons and the Campus Center must be open from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. and 4 p.m. to 7 p.m.

"If [elections commission] do [only open stations in the Campus Center], they'll be directly in violation of the constitution," Nokes said. "If they make that decision, I will be speaking to the commission as soon as possible."

Nokes also announced he will be filling in one cabinet position next week.

"It's absolutely necessary that we have people in place to keep the SGA running," he said. "I'm appointing [a secretary of finance] because I believe it is important to have someone to look over the accounting."

He will bring the appointee to Senate next Wednesday. He said she is not politically affiliated and is a School of Management major.

After the announcement, Nokes was asked what his goal for being in office was.

"I want the elections to run without my name run negatively across the paper," he replied. "My primary responsibility is to make sure the house doesn't burn down."

He did not stay for the entire meeting.

Senators debated the merits of throwing out the elections, threats some senators have received, and the reaction of the public after both the SGA Judiciary and Senate rejected elections results in two different ways last week. The Senate voted to not ratify the results, and the Judiciary ruled they were uncon-

Students rally for Bustamante

Crowd shows support for presidential and trustee candidates

The result of the Student Government Association elections are an obstacle, but an opportunity, Eduardo Bustamante, winner of the recently rejected voting, said yesterday to a crowd of about 75 people at rally on the Student Union steps.

"We need to transfer this energy and take back the SGA," Bustamante said told supporters.

Bustamante and Matthew Murphy, winner of the trustee seat, organized the rally to gain support for their campaign and keep students involved in the election process.

Murphy encouraged students to remain active and work together.

"We demand that our voice be heard," said Murphy.

"The SGA has a lot of resources," said Bustamante. "We have to take those back, and make it for the people."

Emily Russell, president of the Cannabis Reform Club held a mock swearing in of Bustamante and Murphy, who said they are the SGA president and trustee in exile.

"I did have a speech but I won't read it," said Russell. " I just want to swear these guys in as soon as possible."

The crowd cheered during the ceremony.

"I do promise to support the constitution and bylaws of the Student Government Association," repeated Murphy after Russell.

"Someone has to!" yelled a voice in the crowd.

Before the mock swearing in, two students read columns previously published in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

"Students of the University of Massachusetts, each one of you may have your own opinion on whether the motion about constitutionality should have been ratified or not," said Vika Bandari, whose column was published in the Collegian yesterday. "My main concern is that some senators attempted to silence their constituents."

Bandari went on to express her appreciation for Bustamante.

"And to Eddie Bustamante, All I can say is I'm sorry. You have been stripped of your position." she said. " I truly felt like this school can use a president who is passionate about positive change."

Once elected student president, Eduardo Bustamante rallied support at a midday rally yesterday.

After the rally the students, Bustamante and Murphy as well as Sen. Pavel Payano and Sen. Daniel Pozmanter headed to the Campus Center to convene. Students filled out sign-up sheets with their contact information, and individually discussed concerns with each of the candidates.

In addition to the students, Dan Clawson, incoming president of the faculty union, was present at the meeting.

"I was excited to hear that you might have a student government that was actually speaking up for students," he said.

While admitting that he did not believe faculty should be influential in SGA politics, he said that he looks forward to working with a

STA Travel opens office in Campus Center

The STA Travel student travel agency has opened in the Campus Center. Lynda Tiersma, manager, and Peter Easton oversee the agency on campus, which aids student in finding discount flights.

By Matt Elder
Collegian Staff

"This isn't your parent's travel agency," said Lynda Tiersma, branch manager of Student Travel Association Travel, the newest addition to the University of Massachusetts' Campus Center.

STA Travel, a worldwide travel agency, has relocated from Main Street in Amherst to room 204 in the Campus Center, giving students the opportunity to take advantage of their services.

Tiersma said that STA decided to switch to the campus location because it was better exposure for the students. She said that STA Travel is known for being on different college campuses.

Christina Cox, STA Travel's head of public relations, said in a press release that the travel agency plans to offer UMass students and faculty specially negotiated airfares that offer significantly fewer restrictions, more flexibility and minimal penalties for itinerary changes and cancellations than other lower fare airline tickets

"We hope to get every student to travel," she said. "You travel to get an experience you don't get living in Sunderland. You travel through an airport in Paris and it's an experience."

Although some people are still afraid to travel, Tiersma said that her company takes all precautions to assure everyone that the trip is safe. She also said that they offer group tours and that these tours will have an English-speaking person with them at all times.

"Travel is picking up again, and you just need to do it," she said.

Tiersma said that the discounts STA Travel offers are greater for traveling to other countries than in the U.S.

Tiersma is aware of the fact that spring break is huge on campuses like UMass, and she said that STA Travel is doing everything it can to make sure that the students don't get involved in a scam.

"I've heard stories about companies taking money and then closing down," Tiersma said.

She said that STA Travel deals with the consistent spring break companies so that students know they are reputable. Also, she said that these companies must put their money into an escrow account, and STA can check to make sure that the company is in good standing.

Even though spring break is great for business, Tiersma said that the weeklong trips aren't the number one attraction for students. She said that spring break brought in about 10 percent of their business, and that backpacking across Europe

West Bank security barrier sparks clash

By Lara Sukhtian
Associated Press

BIDOU, West Bank (AP) — Israeli workers with chain saws cut down a Palestinian farmer's olive grove yesterday to make way for a West Bank security barrier, sparking a clash in which at least 15 Palestinian villagers and two Israeli police were wounded.

The wrecking crew later replanted some of the 180 stumps on another plot, but villagers gave the trees little or no chance of survival in the dry season.

Construction of the barrier has sparked almost daily clashes as it cuts through Palestinian farmland and isolates West Bank villages. Israel says the series of fences, trenches and concrete walls are needed to stop Palestinian suicide bombers. The Palestinians denounce the barrier as a land grab.

The project is part of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's unilateral plan of "disengagement" from the Palestinians. In addition to imposing a new boundary in the West Bank, Israel plans to withdraw from the Gaza Strip.

Palestinian Foreign Minister Nabil Shaath said he will go to Washington this month to talk to senior U.S. officials about the Gaza plan.

Palestinians say they welcome any Israeli withdrawal, but fear Israel is giving up Gaza to tighten its hold over much of the West Bank, where the bulk of the 220,000 Israeli settlers live.

Shaath said he would meet Secretary of State Colin Powell and National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice on April 21, a week after Sharon holds talks with President Bush.

Sharon is seeking U.S. endorsement for his plan. Shaath said U.S. officials assured him they would not make a decision on the Gaza plan before hearing the Palestinian side.

In weekend interviews, Sharon said the Gaza pullout would not take place until next year. He also said a West Bank redeployment would be minimal, an evacuation of only four of about 140 Jewish settlements there.

Palestinians see the planned route of the barrier, which at times cuts deep into the West Bank, as part of Sharon's plan for retaining much of that territory.

Early yesterday in the village of Bidou, northwest of Jerusalem, a wrecking crew with chain saws and five bulldozers started cutting down farmer Mahmoud Saadeh's olive trees.

"My olives, my olives," Saadeh, 75, yelled as he threw rocks at workers sawing away at his grove. "I've worked on this land for 20 years ... this is our livelihood."

Saadeh said all of his 180 olive trees were cut down.

The Israelis later replanted about 40 of the stripped trunks in a nearby field, apparently without the knowledge of the landowners.

Bidou village councilman Mohammed Ayash said the trees had no chance of survival, because the winter rains were over.

Palestinian farmers do not generally use artificial irrigation on their fields, as water in the West Bank is scarce and expensive. Ayash said that even if the replanted trees could be watered, it would take 10 years for them to grow to full size.

Staff at the Israeli Defense Ministry, which oversees construction of the barrier, could not be reached for comment yesterday, the third day of the weeklong Jewish holiday of Passover.

Raanan Gissin, an adviser to Sharon, said the barrier was an unpleasant necessity, a response to attacks by Palestinian militants from the West Bank.

U.S. forces carry out raids in Fallujah; dozens killed

By Bassem Mroue
Associated Press

FALLUJAH, Iraq (AP) — U.S. Marines battled insurgents for control of this Sunni Muslim stronghold yesterday, calling in airstrikes against a mosque compound where witnesses said dozens were killed in six hours of fighting. An anti-U.S. uprising led by a radical Shiite cleric raged for the fourth day in southern cities.

The Abdel-Aziz al-Samarrai mosque was hit by U.S. aircraft that launched a Hellfire missile at its minaret and dropped a 500-pound bomb on a wall surrounding the compound.

The U.S. military said insurgents were using the mosque for a military fire base. Iraqi witnesses estimated 40 people were killed as they gathered for afternoon prayers. U.S. officials said no civilians died.

An Associated Press reporter who went to the mosque said the minaret was standing, but damaged, apparently by shrapnel. The bomb blew away part of a wall, opening an entry for the Marine assault. The reporter saw at least three cars leaving, each with a number of dead and wounded.

The heavy fighting against the Sunni insurgency coincided again yesterday with attacks on coalition forces in southern Iraq led by militiamen loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. For the first time yesterday, Shiite militiamen battled Americans in the central city of Baqouba.

Since Sunday, 34 Americans, two other coalition soldiers and more than 230 Iraqis have been killed in fighting. The Iraqi figure did not include those killed at the mosque. Since the war began, at least 630 U.S. service members have died.

Marine Corps spokesman 1st Lt. Eric Knapp said the American force besieging Fallujah has killed more than 30 suspected insurgents and captured 51 since Tuesday night. Fifteen Marines were reported killed in fighting in Fallujah and neighboring Ramadi since Monday.

The Army said two more soldiers died yesterday in separate attacks in Balad, a Sunni Triangle town north of Baghdad, and in the capital.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, at a Pentagon news conference with Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Gen. Richard Myers, discounted the strength of the al-Sadr force, which appears to have been bolstered by disgruntled, unemployed young men.

U.S. officials estimate the al-Sadr force at about 3,000 fighters.

"The number of people involved in those battles is relatively small," Rumsfeld said. "There's nothing like an army or large elements of people trying to change the situation. You have a small number of terrorists and militias coupled with some protests."

Myers said the fighting came in two broad categories. West of Baghdad in cities such as Ramadi and Fallujah, the main opposition is "former regime loyalists," including supporters of former president Saddam Hussein, and anti-American foreign fighters loyal to Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, a Jordanian-born terrorist believed linked to al-Qaida.

The Marines said they waged a six-hour battle around the Abdel-Aziz al-Samarrai mosque before calling in a Cobra helicopter which fired the missile at the base of its minaret. An F-16 dropped the laser-guided bomb, Marine Lt. Col. Brennan Byrne said.

During fighting elsewhere in Fallujah, U.S. forces seized a second place of prayer, the al-Muadidi mosque. A Marine climbed the minaret and fired on guerrilla gunmen, witnesses said. Insurgents fired back, hitting the minaret with rocket-propelled grenades and causing it to partially collapse, the AP reporter said.

Brig. Gen. Mark Kimmitt, the chief military spokesman in Iraq, said the Marines did not attack the mosque until it became clear enemy fighters were inside and using it to cover their attacks.

Kimmitt told CNN that from photos of the mosque he had stitutional.

In reaction to the turnout of students at last week's meeting, Sen. David Bettencourt brought 20 of his constituents to support him. Bettencourt was one of the senators voting against ratification.

Bettencourt said he received a threatening note on his door last Thursday after the elections were not ratified.

"This has been something that has been reoccurring … it's just the life of being a political minority on campus," he said.

"I hope for the best. I really don't think this kind of bickering, this kind of name calling and personal slander is representing students," Bettencourt said. "I don't think it belongs in democracy, even though it has become a part of the political system."

Chair James Brennan announced next week the Administrative Affairs Committee will be going over Title VIII of the bylaws, which governs elections. He said he welcomes anyone who has any thoughts to come and discuss changes.

Presidential candidate Brian Long announced that he will keep his name on the ballot, but does not plan on campaigning because of academic reasons.

Presidential candidate Patrick Higgins and trustee candidate Tim Daly announced that they will also run again.

The Senate allocated $17,600 to Area Governments and University Productions and Concerts for spring events and $16,000 to Registered Student Organizations for various spring events on campus, with $33,600 allocated in 20 minutes.

For a second time, the Senate discussed the new charter for the Office of ALANA Affairs. The debate focused on whether or not the vice chancellor of student affairs and campus life should be able to appoint a faculty member to the board from a five-member pool selected by the OAA.

"This is more of a gesture for keeping communication open," Sen. Brian Roberts said in favor of the appointment. "We're not losing control, or even who these people are going to be … This is only helping the office. I just can't see how this is not beneficial."

Sen. Gladys Franco fought this idea, saying she has gone back to her constituents and they do not like this idea.

"You never know if one day the vice chancellor might not ever appoint anyone to the position," she said.

Bettencourt agreed.

"We're bringing in too many people into this process," he said. Presidential candidate Eduardo Bustamante said the proposal could have good or bad results, depending upon the membership the vice chancellor appoints.

"There is a push to take the decision making power out of the students and put into the vice chancellor," Bustamante said. "I don't understand it. The vice chancellor has power over everything anyways. The ALANA students should be able to make their own decisions."

vote on the final charter was not yet voted on at press time.

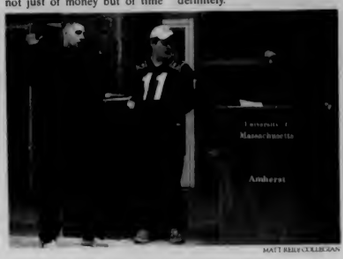
progressive student government.

"I think it [the rally] went well," Bustamante told the Collegian. "The whole crux of the campaign is getting students interested, we don't have the title to help us, but we are doing it anyway … the aim is always the same, to keep our eyes on getting a student body that is awake."



Although most students were present at the event to support Bustamante and Murphy, several were there for broader reasons.

"I'm here because this is an issue that addresses students," said Maxine Dube, a sophomore biology and pre-med major. "If I want something to happen, I have to get involved."

Michael Alden, a senior finance major who did not vote for Bustamante, was upset the SGA would have to hold elections for a second time, arguing that it was a waste of money.

"Just the fact that we have to redo the elections and spend money is inefficient," he said. "Plain and simple it is a waste, not just of money but of time and energy."

When asked if he would vote for Bustamante in the second election, Alden replied "Yes, definitely."

seen, "the actual mosque structure itself" was not damaged.

He said the mosque was protected under the Geneva Conventions but the insurgents nullified that by attacking from the holy place.

At Camp Fallujah, Byrne said the Marines now control 25 percent of Fallujah.

The military gave widely varying casualty counts.

Marine Capt. Bruce Frame, in a statement issued from U.S. Central Command in Tampa, Fla., said: "One anti-coalition force member was killed in the attack. There is no report of civilian casualties."

Byrne said those in the mosque were rebels, and "We believe we killed a bunch."

Kimmitt said, "I understand there was a large casualty toll taken by the enemy."

Rumsfeld said the United States knew risks would increase with the approach of the June 30 date for the handover of power to an interim Iraqi government.

U.S. commanders also fear violence could escalate during the religious ceremonies this weekend for al-Arbaeen, when millions of pilgrims gather in Shiite cities to mark the end of the mourning period for a 7th-century martyred Shiite saint.

The number of U.S. troops in Iraq is up, Rumsfeld said, because of the planned rotation of forces.

"The United states will stay the course. We will stay until the task is complete," he said, warning that some U.S. troops ready to leave the country might have to stay a while longer.

Al-Sadr, meanwhile, said Iraq would become "another Vietnam" for the United States.

"I call upon the American people to stand beside their brethren, the Iraqi people, who are suffering an injustice by your rulers and the occupying army…," he said in a statement issued from his office in the southern city of Najaf. "Otherwise, Iraq will be another Vietnam for America and the occupiers."

Al-Sadr's al-Mahdi Army launched heavy gunbattles with coalition forces in the streets of at least six cities yesterday and, for the first time, in the north. Iraqis protesting the Fallujah operation clashed with U.S. troops outside the northern city of Kirkuk. The battles left eight Iraqis dead and 10 wounded.

Al-Sadr fighters battled American troops in the town of Baqouba, northeast of Baghdad, hitting a U.S. helicopter with small arms fire. The OH-58 Kiowa chopper was damaged and forced to land, but the two crew members were unharmed.

And Shiite gunmen drove Ukrainian forces out of the southern city of Kut — raising concerns over the ability of U.S. allies to combat al-Sadr's uprising.

After overnight fighting in which 12 Iraqis died, the Ukrainians withdrew from Kut with about 20 coalition officials, and al-Sadr followers swept into their base, seized weapons stores and planted their flag on a nearby grain silo.

The black-garbed gunmen of the al-Mahdi Army also had virtual control of the Shiite religious centers of Kufa and Karbala, where Iraqi police were laying low, allowing militiamen to move freely.

Militiamen in Karbala clashed with Polish patrols, and a cleric who was a senior official in al-Sadr's office was killed.

Al-Sadr and his militia are unpopular among most of Iraq's Shiite majority, and there was no sign that the Shiite public in the south was rallying to their side to launch a wider uprising.

But the week's fighting showed a strength that few expected from the al-Mahdi Army.

The country's most respected Shiite leader was silent until yesterday, when he called for all sides to stop fighting.

"Grand Ayatollah al-Sistani condemned the methods used by occupation forces in the current escalating situation in Iraq… We also condemn assaults on public and private property, and any action that disturbs order and prevents officials from carrying out their duties," said a statement from Sistani's office.

But there were signs of sympathy for the Sadr revolt among Sunni insurgents, who have been fighting the U.S.-led occupation for months and have often chided their Shiite countrymen for not joining in.

Portraits of al-Sadr and graffiti praising his "valiant uprising" appeared on mosque and the walls of government buildings in the Sunni city of Ramadi. Peaceful protests in support of al-Sadr occurred in the northern cities of Mosul and Rashad.

Monday night in Baghdad, al-Sadr gunmen went to a mainly Sunni neighborhood to join with insurgents in firing on U.S. Humvees — the only known instance so far of Sunni and Shiite militants combining forces.

High casualty counts in Iraq are worrisome

For several months now, "major fighting" has been over in Iraq, but the death toll keeps growing higher. This may seem like a tired issue: since President Bush landed on the aircraft carrier last May off the coast of California, there has been a torrent of criticism for his early declaration.

But the issue of soldiers and civilians dying in Iraq goes far beyond the president's ill-timed "Mission Accomplished" stunt. People are dying, fighting is fierce, and Iraqis and Americans have both been continuously targeted for either fighting for the Americans or agreeing with them.

Yesterday, in the Sunni Triangle, a mosque was attacked. Two days ago, one dozen Marines were killed, and more have been added since. There have been a plethora of injuries as well. The impetus for these rocket attacks and firefights have been insurgents — non-Iraqis who have filtered into the country from surrounding nations — but the casualties have included these fighters and innocents. Iraqi civilians in the mosques, city streets and homes.

It is a difficult truth involved with war that people will die, but the deaths associated with this phase of the war are more worrisome, because it is supposed to be mostly over.

Is it an accountability issue? The president rode the fighter plane to the aircraft carrier, stood at the podium with the now infamous banner unfurled behind him. Since then, the casualty count has climbed past 600 for Americans alone, not counting British, Australian, Spanish, Polish and other nations' troops.

All of these countries sent troops in and when Bush took to the deck of the navy ship they should have been able to expect to see more of them returning — major fighting was over after all. But this has not happened, and it doesn't appear to be fast approaching.

Politics and poor timing aside, soldiers are dying and worse than that the numbers for "collateral damage," the sterilized way of saying dead Iraqi citizens, are increasing.

Pulling troops? No better an answer, but as the political season speeds up it is a surety that the war will only become more of a headline and debate topic, and this will surface. We as Americans don't want to see more Americans die, and we shouldn't want to see more Spaniards, Poles, Australians, British or certainly Iraqis die, either. But what has been achieved from a war that is clearly not a "Mission Accomplished?"

In short Iraq has become a quagmire, a mix of politics and military, required defense and optional offense: a truly muddy brew that has sucked a country in and will not quickly spit us back out.

Trapped in a political, logistical gamble it seems that this president and whoever comes next are going to see growing death tolls that, in a country and an arena where it may never be "Mission Accomplished."

'Can you hear me now?'

Gilad Skolnick

Lately everyone has been walking around with those sharp cellular telephones, rubbing it in about how swell they are. Well I have something heavy to say: I confess that I do not own one, and I am proud of it. I am one of the few admirable people that are left who chooses not to have such an invention.

Yes, I actually use the call boxes on campus to communicate with people, and anyone who lives off campus is too Sylvan-like or antisocial anyway, and they are not worth talking to. I'm proud of using the call boxes. While they do not give you much privacy, they are conveniently located throughout campus. I've heard people making fun of these call boxes, calling them "candyass," but I must object to this name-calling. Using only the call boxes is perfectly solid.

They are rugged and super to use. Your steady girl will love to know that her man is willing to go outside and brave the elements to call her. I have far more respect for a man who is no wimp, a man who uses the call boxes for all his communication needs with pride. With its vibrant yellow glow and its beautiful shape, I think it's one of the grooviest things on campus, aside from Whitmore. People who use the call boxes look like they are on top of things and know what they are doing — they are no spaz, but rather, people with honor.

I've noticed that no one with a cellular telephone ever feels adequate. There is always some new boss or cool cellular telephone around that can do something better, whether it be those new telephones that can take photographs or the ones that can respond to your voice, or play some choice arcade game on it.

Everyone is either feeling pathetic for having an obsolete phone or constantly showing off how far out their new phone is that they spend their bread on, sometimes costing them hundreds of dollars. Not having a cellular telephone allows me to not have to deal with any of that.

They are also a distraction from our studies, as fellow students resort to playing those funky arcade games on them instead of listening to the instructor, often missing valuable information.

Cellular telephones tend to encourage young fellows to stay up late, sometimes even several hours after dark talking, rather than getting a solid night of sleep. If a conversation is really important, they will come to you. I am no ditz, I understand that many people are into this latest fad, but I remain convinced that this fad will go the way of love beads and 8-Track Tape Players.

A cellular phone robs you of your free time, of your privacy and it prevents you from getting away from it all.

You might get jazzed at the thought of owning your own cellular telephone, but the cost is just not hangin'. They can run from $30 to even $50 or more dollars per month to use, not to mention the cost of the actual telephone. Is talking to people really worth $600? I think not.

There's still mixed evidence about the supposed radiation that these telephones emit into your heads, and is that a risk you're willing to take? Mixed studies have shown that it is possible that your head can be exposed to harmful amounts of radiation, which certainly is not neat at all.

Among the worst results of using this terrible fad is the distraction that it can create while driving. Often people driving while on the phone pay less attention to other cars and to their speed, which aside from dangerous, could get you in trouble with the fuzz.

I do not want to be square, but how many of you after a night of drinking brewski, have taken out your cellular telephone and while blitzed called someone? Not only is this embarrassing, but it can complicate things with your old man, old lady, steady girlfriend or boyfriend. I've seen many times people say what was exactly on their mind in these situations, which can have a detrimental effect on their relationships.

People also always forget to turn off their portable telephones, which ring during awkward times during movies, exams, or simply even a lecture. It is distracting to the whole class, interrupts, and is rude, but unfortunately is unavoidable unless one refrains from owning such. I for one do not want to be "that guy" who never shuts his cellular phone.

A cellular phone robs you of your free time, of your privacy and prevents you from getting away from it all. Retreating for some alone time is futile when you are reachable wherever you go, you might as well always be in your pad.

Now I'm not Lip Flappin' about this, because sometimes I feel as if I am the only one without one of these phones. People have to realize that cellular telephones make the world a more complicated place. If we all spent a little less time on our telephones and a little more time actually meeting people maybe we'd have a more social and friendly world. Drop the cellular phones — their only place is in the bone yard. I promise you that you will have a twitchin' blast.

The bittersweet side to war

Cameron J. Woods

For anyone who would like to criticize female soldiers, I would like to introduce you to Pvt. Pamela Starkie of the United States Army's First Infantry 47 deployment. Starkie, age 19, scored as a top marksman with her AK-47 and received top marks for her grenade throwing. To me, Starkie is more than just a good soldier — she is my little sister.

My little sister that is bound for Iraq.

Before she ever learned to fire an automatic rifle that weighs about half as much as she does, Starkie was learning how to be tough from her two older brothers. It was not the usual sibling squabbling by any means. As the scrappiest of us, Starkie hardly took any crap without giving some back. If my brother and I stuck briers in her hair, we had to make sure that she did not have her softball bat handy, or else we were in for it.

Growing up, we all took different interests. For me, it was the liberal world of academia and journalism, but for my little sister living life seemed to be the be all end all of her existence. It would be an obsession with fashion one day and football the next, but in all of her mercurial dabbling, she never pretended to be anything but herself.

As the middle of four children, I felt that there was a sort of unspoken level of understanding between my sister and I. That is not to say that there was always peace between us, but there was a sort of similarity that bonded us as siblings, feuding at times, but always there for each other.

In mid-June of 2003, she came home and casually dropped the news that she had enlisted in the military. We were not shocked in the least. She knew she had no direction for her impending future as and "adult" and the Army would be a place of opportunity for her.

True to the grudging sibling stereotype, we did not have an overly emotional parting when she shipped out for boot camp. It was not until after she had left that the idea sunk in on me with all its weight; I may have seen my sister for the last time. Her letters, when they did come, showed an ever maturing of her personality.

After completing her training as a medical shipping and receiving specialist, she was to be stationed in Hawaii. Envy is not the word; she joins the military and gets to go to Hawaii and I am studying my brain out and I get ... Amherst? If only that would have been the case, maybe I could have told her off face-to-face next spring break on a tropical beach.

I want nothing more than for my sister to come home, or just be stationed outside of all conflict zones, but I know that by her being in Iraq someone else's sibling, spouse, or child will be coming home.

Two weeks ago, I get a call at the ungodly hour of 7 a.m. on a Saturday morning. The brain fog was blasted away by the news I get from my mother. Pamela's unit was being deployed to Iraq, and she was coming home for the upcoming week before shipping out.

That Friday, I packed light and shattered speed laws to get home, as she was leaving before dawn on Saturday. I got my chance to say goodbye, but true to form we did not exchange the typical "be safe," "I will miss you," or even "good luck."

Instead she said very little and the last thing I said was, "You have nothing to worry about because evil people never die."

She just laughed, but I could hear how weakly she was holding back her tears. Then she was gone.

I am in no way supportive of this stupid war, a war that we as a nation have no need to be in. But that does not mean I do not support our soldiers, because each of them had to say a goodbye to someone who is still here, just like Pamela had to. They are all our family as Americans and as humans. I want nothing more than for my sister to come home, or to just be stationed outside of all conflict zones, but I know that by her being in Iraq someone else's sibling, spouse, or child will be coming home.

My biggest fear at this point is not in the knowledge that she could never be coming back, because I am not yet ready to admit that. It is that when she does come home she will not be the same Pamela that she was. Every soldier is altered by wartime experience — look at our nation's Vietnam and Somalia veterans — there is irrefutable research done on the long term psychological affects that war has on people.

I know that she signed up on her own, knowing full well what she was getting into, as she has done everything else in her life. I just hope that she will come home again someday and be herself. More than anything I just wish we had had more time, and that I had been able to say what I actually meant behind the, "Evil people never die," which was, "I love you, and you better come home."

Clearing up a controversy

Michael Sheridan

This is addressed to every student on campus regarding the Student Government Association. I feel members of the SGA have gone far too long without speaking out over the current controversy surrounding the SGA. I will no longer sit back and keep my mouth shut. One of the biggest problems with SGA is they have no relations with the student body. It is time for a change, it is time for someone to stand up and keep the students informed of what is happening with their student government.

Two branches of the student government deemed the elections invalid. A petition was filed before the March elections took place by Speaker Jared Nokes to the Judiciary branch of our student government, asking them to stop elections because he felt instant run-off voting violated the SGA by-laws. Due to time constraints the justices (all undergraduate students) of the Judiciary could only meet after elections.

After the elections had taken place, the Judiciary ruled instant run-off voting unconstitutional and deemed the elections invalid. They stated on Friday, April 2, Eduardo Bustamante would have to leave office and the Speaker of the Senate, Jared Nokes would become President until a new general election was held at the end of April (which coincides with Title 1 Article 6 Section 4 of the SGA's by-laws). There was nothing the Senate could do about this ruling. The Judiciary is a separate branch of the SGA and the Senate does not have the power to overrule them.

On the Senate's March 31 meeting, the Senate voted 21-24 to not ratify the elections. There were too many problems with the way the Elections Commission was run. The Elections Commission is a group of undergraduate students appointed by the living area governors and approved by the Senate. Their job is to run the fall and spring semester SGA elections. One major problem was that a polling station was closed. The polling place at Berkshire dining commons was closed both election days from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. This violated Title 8 Chapter 21 Section 1 of the SGA's by-laws. The Senate was assured by members of the Elections Commission that Title 8 of the SGA's by-laws would be upheld and that this would be a fair election.

The Senate was lied to — this was not a fair election and the Senate had no choice but to not ratify the elections. Berkshire had the highest voter turnout in the Spring 2003 elections and it was closed for the 2004 elections. How was the Senate supposed to react to that? I can only imagine what voter turn out would have been, combined with the 2,700 people who turned out to vote, if Berkshire was open. The Elections Commission did not even post any signs stating that Hampshire polling place was open and that students who lived in Southwest South could vote there.

It was extremely important for the Senate not to ratify the March elections because it supported the Senate's requirements that elections be run properly and fairly by the Elections Commission. The majority of the Senate felt that everyone should have an equal opportunity to vote and no one should be silenced by the SGA. If one student is not allowed to vote due to polling places being closed, that is one student too many and the Senate should not allow that to happen. Not ratifying these elections was an important move made by the Senate to send a message that only fair elections would be tolerated.

Not ratifying these elections was an important move made by the Senate to send a message that only fair elections would be tolerated.

Do not believe everything you read, it often appears one-sided and does not inform students of the whole issue. I can assure everyone there are dedicated members of the SGA who devote hours of time working for students and the spring events planned will show this campus how the entire SGA is working for students. If anyone has any questions regarding anything to do with the SGA, please feel free to leave contact information and any questions in my mailbox in the SGA office located at 420 Student Union.

TAKING COBAIN'S MUSIC TO THE NEXT PLATEAU

By Nick Romanow

Collegian Columnist

Ten years ago today, Kurt Cobain's body was found. I remember exactly where I was when I found out. I was in the kitchen, and I had just come home from school when my mom told me.

I remember leaning up against the wall next to the door that led to the basement. I also remember being upset, although given my young age I wasn't able to grow as attached to the music as I would in the years to come.

My mom had promised, a few months prior to the suicide, that the next time Nirvana came to town I would be old enough to go. I couldn't wait; I knew it would be the biggest thing to happen in my life.

Of course that never happened. I remember my mom ripped off the cover of the next week's People magazine, which paid tribute to Kurt, and gave it to me. I still have the torn, wrinkly cover hanging up in my room. I was nine years old — certainly not old enough to understand teen angst and heroin addiction, but still the music meant something to me.

Mostly, when Kurt died, I was confused. I understood suicide and I knew Kurt had problems, both emotionally and drug-related, so I wasn't so confused by his suicide. I was confused about what would happen to music. How could anything follow Nirvana? Nirvana's music was so powerful and just so astounding that even before I was old enough to truly comprehend it, I was still shaken.

I have been a Nirvana fan since I was 6 or 7 — "Nevermind" was one of the very first tapes I had. I have a very clear memory of standing in the front hall, just feet away from the spot where I would eventually find out about Kurt's death, holding that tape, staring at the now iconic cover of the baby in a pool, chasing after a dollar bill. It was my mom's tape. I certainly have her to thank for getting me into good music that early in my life.

"Nevermind" was, and still is, like nothing else I've heard. I can't even count how many times I listened it. I have no idea how many copies I've gone through, but I'm sure it's more then any of my other albums.

Of course "Nevermind" is only the tip of the iceberg. I remember getting "Bleach", Nirvana's first album. I remember the first time I saw "Incesticide", the B-sides compilation that followed "Nevermind". I didn't know what B-sides or outtakes were, and without bastions of information like the Internet, I didn't even know the band was putting out a 'new' album. I grabbed that tape like it was the only one in existence, like it was necessary to keep my heart beating. Twelve years later, I still feel that way about it. (Actually, I feel that way about all Nirvana records.)

I remember sitting in my beach house in the summer of 1993, watching the "Heart Shaped Box" video over and over on MTV. When "In Utero" came out it was like getting electrotherapy. Even though I didn't understand any of those Nirvana albums the way I do now (and I am of the firm belief that, like any great record, every Nirvana song will always continue to unfold and grow and gain new meaning.)

Each song was great but it was just so different. Yes, "Nevermind" was revolutionary, but it was "In Utero" that really brought me to, well, nirvana. They free raw energy. In the liner notes for "Incesticide," Kurt told off homophobes and misogynists.

One of the reasons Kurt made such great, honest music is that he was a real and good-hearted person who would rather starve then be supported by detestable people. Kurt also really liked to piss off people. Who else would name a track "Rape Me", make it vaguely similar to their biggest hit, and then threaten to play it at numerous TV appearances? Kurt, and Krist and Dave, were one of the leaders of the very cool concept of promoting other bands. It was rare that the band would show up for a photo shoot not wearing a shirt of some unsung band.

Nirvana's talent wasn't limited to the four commercial albums worth of studio material. Some of their best songs can't be found on any of those discs. "Verse Chorus Verse" is not just one of Nirvana's best, but I firmly believe, one of the best pop/rock songs of all time. Few other moments in recorded music consistently hit with the intensity when in "Moist Vagina" Kurt repeatedly, in a cracked and broken voice, screams "Marijuana!"

Kurt was about as big of an influence on my life as my mom was. Nirvana has been with me for so long, practically my whole life, that I can't imagine a world without

'Eve' takes on the issue of emotional fulfillment over good sex

Q: My boyfriend and I have been together for five months, and he refuses to have sex because of religious reasons. I knew this when we met, but I feel as though sex is just a technicality now. He won't even consider the possibility, so I broke up with him. I feel bad that I dumped him because he won't sleep with me, but I can't be with him if I can't take our intimacy to a higher level. Did I make the right decision? -K.G.

A: Of course! Your biggest mistake was being with a person of such an opposite mentality to begin with. You both obviously have different beliefs, and I'm sure you would have conflicted sooner or later over something because of these differences. Go find yourself a guy that can satisfy your needs. I'm sure it won't be difficult.

Q: I finally went out on a date with this guy I've been interested in. We had an amazing time, and found that we have so much in common. But I made a very big mistake by sleeping with him at the end of the night. I usually don't do that with guys I actually like and want more with. But it just felt like the right thing to do. He hasn't called me since, and I feel like he used me. Now I just feel stupid and I wish I had never given him such a bad impression. What now? --M.L.

A: Most of us have been through this before. All I can say is that you should never, ever sleep with a guy after the first date. But I see you already know this. Just use this as an experience of what not to do in the future. And as for him, if he doesn't call within a week, then he's not even worth asking advice about. You should move on to more respectable guys. If he does call, then make sure to let him know you are not that kind of girl and proceed with what feels right. Knowing guys, if the sex was good, he'll call again.

Original Sin

Eve

What happened to self-respect? What happened to guys having to work hard at getting the girl? Why have I suddenly lost all respect for myself and for my girlfriends? I have noticed how we seem to have neglected our standards and expectations of men — possibly to feel loved for just one minute. Maybe longer. But why do we have to be so disgustingly easy?

My criteria for having a new girlfriend exceeds my criteria for a new boyfriend by far. I prefer choosing a more reliable friend because they will always be there. But this weekend I chose not to understand my girlfriend, and I am saddened by her actions. And my actions. And the amount of effort we put into men without reciprocation.

I met her last summer, as we were both nannies on Martha's Vineyard. She was independent, unique, beautiful, and challenging. I respected her for that. But she chose to fall in love with an islander toward the end of our stay, and I knew I might as well kiss her independent qualities goodbye.

To be honest, I never liked him from our first encounter, nor will I ever like him for any summer to come. But I'm not dating him, so I kept my mouth shut as I watched her blindly fall. It took until the winter before she discovered he is married, has other women on the side.

She came to me for help. She stayed over for a full week to experience what man-hating boot camp is like. And so we did. And she left as the friend I used to know.

But I knew the drama was only over temporarily. She planned to work on the Vineyard this summer, and I was certain she would get back with him. And she did. I didn't find out until I went back to the Vineyard. As we sat over dinner, she began to justify her irrational decisions by saying, "The sex is incredible, why should I deprive myself?"

This infuriated me. Why? I don't know. Maybe because in no way is he being punished for infidelity. Or maybe I know she will be heart-broken once again at the end of all of this. Or maybe I see how I was when I was in love with my unworthy ex.

I guess I believe that somewhere we are better than that. When will our priorities straighten out? When will we be seen again as the unique individual women that we are, and not as objects? But I realized we never really give these guys the chance to see us as anything but objects. We just jump at any opportunity we can to sleep with them to express our love. Most guys would agree that sex is our main source of power. Maybe we should start using this knowledge to our advantage ... and wait.

Local H cuts another great album

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

Local H, the two-man powerhouse best known for the alterna-rock hit "Bound For The Floor" (a.k.a. 'that Copacetic song', 'Keep It Copacetic', 'Born To Be Down" etc. etc.) from their 1996 album "As Good As Dead", are known to never be content with recycling the same songs over and over.

While the band's first two albums established them as a great force their next album's, 1998's "Pack Up The Cats" and 2002's "Here Comes The Zoo", which confirmed that Local H was one of the sharpest and most challenging and electrifying bands around. On their new album, "Whatever Happened To P.J. Soles", the band, led by singer/guitarist/bassist Scott Lucas, experiments even more then usual, going down exciting and unexpected paths.

Local H, with their clever lyrics, distorted guitar, arld influences ranging from Husker Du to Cheap Trick, embody a lot of things — call them alternative, grunge, punk, indie, slacker-rock, smart-rock, smart-ass rock — it all works. "P.J. Soles" keeps the band's ethic

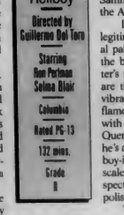
One 'Hell' of a movie

Hellboy not just another comic book hero

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

Ron Perlman is not a famous actor. With those heavy, stone-faced features of his, he's become one of those "that guy" guys — the actors you recognize but don't know, unless you're the kind of obsessive genre fanboys who pour each issue of Fangoria and Cinescape with a fine-toothed comb.

He's probably best known as the soulful, leonine hero in the TV soap opera "Beauty and the Beast", but with "Hellboy," based on the underground comic created by Mike Mignola, Perlman is given the chance to take the lead in an expansive, fantastical sci-fi action adventure (courtesy of Guillermo Del Toro, the ultimate fanboy director.)



It's an opportunity he makes the best of. Perlman makes Hellboy, a blood-red demon who fights on the side of good, jocular and brash, a superhero with the gruffly laidback demeanor of a working-class average Joe. It's a witty way to portray a savior of the world (everyone knows most comic book good guys are usually presented as brooding, tortured messiahs) and it gives the movie a giddy charge.

As presented here, Hellboy looks like the kind of hulking Technicolored monstrosity that you'd usually find on your average episode of "Buffy, the Vampire Slayer." But he acts like the guy you find playing darts at the bar. Hellboy is a superhero with a fondness for beer and Baby Ruth bars, a weakness for cats and kittens and an even bigger one for Liz Sherman (Selma Blair) the pretty, but troubled, pyrokinetic love who has holed herself up in an institution to learn to control her powers.

The world of "Hellboy" is one in which ancient evil exists, but it's the kind of non-religious evil wherein all the devils and demons are afraid of Catholic symbols not because God exists, but because its old literary tradition. It opens in Scotland during World War II, when Allied soldiers — lead by a British paranormal expert in a tweedy jacket — stop the mad monk Rasputin (yes, that very Rasputin) from opening up a portal to hell and allowing the "Seven Gods of Chaos" to spill into our world this allowing Hitler to win the war. They manage to close it, but not before one little thing slips through: a tiny red baby devil with a stone for a right hand.

The expert, "Broom" Bruttenholm (he grows up to be the wizened John Hurt), adopts the little creature, gives him the nom-de-Hades Hellboy, and raises him as a son; the action cuts to present day when a 60-ish Hellboy (his aging process, however, makes him seem 20-ish) is now the resident muscle for the FBI's Bureau of Paranormal Investigation and Research.

Trouble brews when Rasputin is raised from the dead — after "The Passion of the Christ," "Dawn of the Dead" and now this, it's become quite a year for the those being raised from the beyond — to continue wreaking havoc on the world. The havoc starts with the releasing of the monster Sammael, which looks like a cross between the Alien and Kothoga form "The Relic."

Del Toro may be modern cinema's first legitimate horror auteur. He works in a visual palette of icy blacks and grays, the cool, the bleached hues of a New England winter's morning. The only colors of vivid life are the red smear that is Hellboy and the vibrant neon blue when Liz bursts into flames, white-hot fire whipping and twisting with elegant grace around her body. Like Quentin Tarantino and Robert Rodriguez, he's a director indebted to the culture of fanboy-ism; he's a pop-fantasist on the highest scale. "Hellboy" is a big-budget special FX spectacle, but it's one made with the artful, polished beauty of real moviemaking.

The movie is not just an action film. It's also a romance, a genuinely lovely one at that. Perlman and Blair share a sweet misfit chemistry, and it gives Perlman a chance to indulge in his softer side — he brings to Hellboy a touching, soulful vulnerability. The triangle that develops between Red (as he's nicknamed), Liz and the boyish new agent (Rupert Evans) assigned to watch over the hulking demon is a bit pat — we know where its headed anyway — but it still has a tinge of romantic feeling.

"Hellboy" differs from your average superhero epics, preposterous wooden clunkers like "The Hulk" and "Daredevil." This time, it's actually entertaining. Perlman brings a welcome humor to Hellboy, which goes a long way since the movie gets bogged down by conventional supernatural skirmishes. The movie is slightly overlong; there are stretches when Del Toro lets the action drag. "Hellboy" for all it's outsize fun, is never a great comic book entertainment; there's none of the weight of, say, an "X-Men" film. But it's cool enough to keep the movie from descending into hell.

Bound for more than the floor

and attitude while exploring all the different avenues that their music can travel down.

"I had a [side] band called A Band Called Horse," Lucas said. "We'd fk around with ['Buffalo Trace' a sprawling epic that eventually landed on the new album] a lot and I didn't think it was a Local H song. And then I started thinking, 'well, what the hell does that mean?'"

The redefining of a Local H song seems to be the purpose of "P.J. Soles" which features the menacing-psychedelic angst of "That's What They All Say" and the teary-eyed love letter that is the title song. P.J. Soles is an actress who, in her heyday, starred in "Halloween" and "Rock 'n' Roll High School" amongst others. "As far as iconic presence ... I don't think you can get much better," said Lucas.

"There shouldn't be any set criteria in our mind as to what is and isn't a Local H song," Lucas said. "I think we've always been pretty relaxed as far as things like that go but this was the most relaxed we've ever been by far. I think the last record was so rigorously structured that some of the things ... like those little detours and left turns [were ignored] and we want to get back to that on this record."

Lucas' idea worked and "P.J. Soles" proves that Local H is still one of the most original, exciting, and fresh bands around. "Dick Jones", with its studio effects and guitar pedals is practically unidentifiable as a Local H song. "Hey Rita" has Lucas' screams and St. Clair's stomping drums, but sounds nothing like anything the band has done. "Everyone Alive" is a bolstering anthem that attacks the worker-drone lifestyle.

Lucas intentionally wanted to mix things up; aside from just pushing boundaries in his song writing, he put a lot of consideration into making new sounds as well.

"[There] was a lot more paying attention to tones and getting different sounds and trying to fk things up as much as possible," Lucas said. "Most of the time was spent trying to get really interesting guitar sounds and vocal sounds ... and just get the most spontaneity and life out of it."

"P.J. Soles" — one of the best tracks on the album — finds Lucas stretching in many ways. The soft, sad, and spacey guitar cautiously leads the way for Lucas' vocals. In the chorus, Lucas goes from a scream to a falsetto as he cries out, "And if I do think of you, it's only in the darkest place inside of me," as a haunting keyboard lines quickly enters and exits the listener's consciousness.

"It is [more personal]," Lucas said. "I think in each record you can find stuff like that and I think there are the little stabs at pop-culture on this record as well...'California Songs', that's a good example of a Local H type of swipe at things. I think all the records have something personal...Feel-wise and lyric-wise I think there's something a bit more honest about this record. That's probably why I chose to actually print the lyrics this time...I actually think I got to a place on this record where I was like 'oh, these lyrics are pretty good.'"

Lucas said "Everyone Alive" and "California Songs" prove that he still has his acidic touch while songs like "P.J. Soles" and "Mellowed", which features acoustic guitar, are more introspective.

The record, like many Local H albums, is tied together by a theme which is evident in the title of the album and the names of the opener, "Where Are They Now", and the closer, "Halcyon Days (Where Were You Then)"

"[The record's] about this kind of eat-em-up-and-spit-em-out culture that we've got ... [these shows] asking 'where are they now' the people asking these questions ... don't have a right to ask them," Lucas said. "It's a bunch of people I've never even heard of asking ... people [that] have made real contributions to our culture where are they now. This tone of 'what have you done lately', well — what have you ever done, what will you ever do?" Lucas said.

The album also addresses what happens to people when they drop from the public eye.

"Aside from just fame and pop culture ... there's also a lot of stuff on the record about how you just keep living and you don't give up and what happens when you get older," he said.

Lucas might not be a fallen star, but he certainly has some insight. Local H is still largely known as a one-hit-wonder; "Bound For The Floor" still gets spun on the radio while the band's newer singles are largely ignored.

"If I really believed that [the radio should stop playing it] then I should burn all the checks, I should not play the song live anymore. I wrote it and I know what I mean by it and I know what it should feel like. I certainly don't feel obligated to play it ... I certainly don't feel like it's an albatross around my neck and I'm not afraid to play it."

Lucas isn't held back by what songs of his are being played on the radio — but he does ponder the other songs out there, thus "California Songs", with the refrain 'please no more California songs and fuck New York too!', was born

"Everyone seems to think [I was set off by] that Phantom Planet song ['California']. I think when I started getting really angry was [the Red Hot Chili Pepper's] 'Californication'... just constantly mythologizing California ... Plus, there's that sense of regional arrogance to both New York and LA like they're the center of the universe ... it's a big country, there's a lot of voices and a lot of people that have things to say."

Even after a decade, the affects of Cobain's music linger.

Gone but not forgotten

them. He is the reason I picked up a guitar, and his love of noise and distortion is directly responsible for my feedback fetish. One of my great aspirations is to be able to sing like Kurt.

Ten years after Kurt's death, music has gone on. There have been numerous truly exceptional bands that have definitely made major impacts on the world of music and on me, but no one has really been able to fill Kurt's void.

That's not something to be sad about though — no one is supposed to be able to replace Kurt. That's what makes him great. When people ask me who my favorite band is, I don't often say Nirvana. It's not because there are other bands I like more then Nirvana, it's because Nirvana is ingrained in me so deeply that they are second nature.

They've shaped me a hundred times more then I'll ever be able to comprehend.

Bruins grab 1-0 series lead

CHARLES KRUPA/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Souray's power-play shot from the right point and held on to the puck.

Gonchar scored the first goal at 5:12 of the opening period on a 40-foot wrist shot after taking a drop pass from Nylander.

The Bruins obtained Gonchar on March 3 to help their power play, but the unit became less effective than it was prior to the trade with Washington.

The next day, they traded for Nylander who had one goal and 11 assists in 15 games for them.

The pair combined for the second goal at 19:01 of the first period when Gonchar passed the puck from 45 feet in the center of the offensive zone to Nylander, who tipped it in from the right corner of the crease.

Knuble made it 3-0 at 18:24 of the second when he tipped in a shot that 18-year-old rookie Patrice Bergeron put into the crease from a few feet to the left of Theodore.

Notes: Montreal won 22 of the previous 29 playoff series against Boston.

-The Bruins won just two of their last 11 playoff series and none in the last four seasons of play.

-Boston was 3-0-1-2 against Montreal in the regular season but outscored the Canadiens only 9-7.

-Montreal was 1-3-0-1 in its last five regular-season games, while Boston went 3-1-1.

Man pleads innocent to manslaughter after post-Super Bowl incident

BOSTON – A 24-year-old city man pleaded innocent Wednesday to manslaughter and other charges stemming from a post-Super Bowl melee in which he allegedly drove his SUV through a crowd of Patriots fans, killing a man.

Stanley Filoma was allegedly drunk when he struck James Grabowski, 21, of West Newbury while speeding away in attempt to evade police after midnight on Feb. 2.

Grabowski suffered head trauma and later died. Four other victims, Lucas Barosky, Joshua Bersey, Thomas Pasquale and Jason Stackiewicz, all survived their injuries.

Filoma was arraigned in Suffolk Superior Court on a total of 14 charges, including assault and battery, operating under the influence and leaving the scene of an accident.

Manslaughter carries a maximum sentence of 20 years.

At the request of prosecutors, Judge Joseph M. Walker raised Filoma's bail to $35,000. Filoma had posted bail by early Wednesday afternoon, a worker in the clerk's office said.

Filoma's attorney, Bruce Namenson, did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

The incident occurred a few hours after the New England Patriots beat the Carolina Panthers in the Super Bowl. Rowdy fans poured into the streets around Northeastern and Boston universities.

Several hours afterward, Filoma took a Breathalyzer test that registered his blood alcohol level at .09. The legal limit is .08.

Jay Gibbons hit an RBI single in the bottom half, and Bigbie homered in the seventh.

Notes: The Red Sox, who stranded 23 runners in their first two games, left only seven on base.

-Both of Ainsworth's losses in the AL have come against Boston.

-Bigbie's homer was the Orioles' second of the season, the first since Lopez connected in the second inning of the opener.

-Kapler was the only Boston starter that failed to get a hit or walk.

Bruins draw first blood

Raycroft makes 31 saves as Boston grabs series lead

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON – Andrew Raycroft posted a shutout in his playoff debut, Boston's mediocre power play came alive, and the Bruins beat the Montreal Canadiens 3-0 in their playoff opener Wednesday night.

Raycroft, one of the NHL's top rookies, stopped 31 shots.

Sergei Gonchar and Michael Nylander, both obtained from Washington in early March, scored in the first period, and Mike Knuble connected late in the second, all against Jose Theodore.

The second-seeded Bruins can take a 2-0 lead in the best-of-seven series against the seventh-seeded Canadiens at home on Friday night.

Gonchar and Knuble scored on power plays for the Bruins, who had the worst man-advantage unit among the eight Eastern Conference playoff teams (16.6 percent). They were 17th in the NHL during the regular season.

The Bruins got a boost when captain Joe Thornton, their leading scorer, returned after missing two games with an upper body injury. He was hurt last Thursday night when he was hit on the wrist and fell against Washington.

Theodore got little protection as he faced 23 shots in the first period and 39 overall.

Two years ago, Theodore was outstanding when eighth-seeded Montreal eliminated top-seeded Boston in the first round.

Raycroft, who shared playing time with Felix Potvin for most of the first 25 games of the season, started the next 11.

He excelled as the first-stringer the rest of the way, finishing with a 2.05 goals-against average and three shutouts.

With 11:08 gone in the second period, he stopped Jan Bulis on a point-blank shot after Bulis rushed up ice.

At 14:14, he saved Sheldon

The rise of the teenage star

Matt Barstow

At 14, Freddy Adu will not be able to drive to practice for another two years.

, But he sure won't mind walking or riding his bike to the nearest ATM to cash the largest paycheck in Major League Soccer history.

When Adu made his Major League debut with the D.C United Saturday, he became not only the youngest player — but also the richest, in MLS history. His $500,000 salary is part of a trend that is turning teenagers into superstars, and adolescents into heroes.

During halftime of Saturday's game, Adu kicked off his advertising debut with a 30-second commercial for Sierra Mist. The ad immediately locked Adu in a lemon-lime battle of epic proportions against fellow underclassman and Sprite spokesman, LeBron James.

Sprite, owned by Coca-Cola, and Pepsi's Sierra Mist are taking part of an advertising trend aimed at using teen athletes to peddle products to a young consumer base.

Even though LeBron is six years older than Adu, at 20, he is one year removed from high school and quickly becoming a force in the NBA. And the list goes on.

Golfing phenom Michelle Wie made noise in January, when she missed qualifying for the Sony Open by one stroke. The "wonder girl" from Honolulu placed better than 47 men at the Open, and at 14 became one of only four women to ever earn a spot on the PGA Tour.

Even in contact sports, the talent pool seems to be getting younger and younger.

This year's race for the Rocket Richard Trophy award for most goals in the National Hockey League, ended in a three-way tie. Gerome Igilna of the Calgary Flames will share the title with Blue Jacket Rick Nash and Thrasher Ilya Kovalchuk. At 26, Igilna looks like a feeble old man compared to 20-year-old Igilna and 19-year-old Nash.

At 25-45, the Blue Jackets don't have much to celebrate, but they took a step in the right direction by signing Nash to a three-year deal that will fetch the youngster a maximum of $12 million after incentives. Without a prayer to make the playoffs, the Blue Jackets thought young and signed 18-year-old Nash to anchor a faltering franchise in 2002.

This mentality is simply good business for teams — find players young and sign them cheap.

In truth, little can be done to stop kids from leaving high school to chase a "Hoop Dream," in the NBA or another professional league. By the time a student-athlete achieves notoriety, he or she begins thinking they are good enough to make the Big Leagues.

But a pubic service announcement should be made. For every Kobe Bryant and Kevin Garnett who leaves high school for the pros, there are 10 other ballers out there who could use the schooling of a math teacher rather than a Boston Celtic.

Most teenagers are not mature enough to handle the pressures of life on and off the court as a professional athlete. But when scouts go to high schools waving around big wads of cash and even bigger promises, the idea of sticking around a classroom begins to lose its appeal.

From 1995-2000, only 11 students left high school for the NBA, a number that's sure to increase with every highlight of LeBron James and Carmelo Anthony dunking over veterans.

Yet with all the problems early entry causes, nothing can be done to reverse the trend.

Maurice Clarett proved this fact in September, when he sued the NFL for its attempt to deny him admission into this month's draft. A judge found in favor of Clarett, and granted the running back early admission after only two years at Ohio State. The previous rule from 1990 stated that players must be at least three years removed from high school before turning pro.

Clarett and fellow sophomore Larry Fitzgerald of Pittsburgh are among 27 collegiate football players to declare eligible for the draft.

But all this talk about appropriate ages leads me to one question: If teens are old enough to play professional sports at 14, earn a Carmelo-sized bonus at 18, and win a Stanley Cup at 19, shouldn't I be able to drink at 20?

Tennis star enjoys success

By Tim Ryan
Collegian Correspondent

Dorothy Iwanowicz may seem like a very reserved person off the court, but her explosive play on the court this year has earned her respect from her teammates, as well as an Atlantic 10 Performer of the Week award.

Iwanowicz has quietly battled for a 9-4 personal match record so far in the Minutewomen's 7-10 spring season.

Last week, she went undefeated, taking a singles and doubles match from the University of Rhode Island to go along with the singles match she took care of against Fordham University.

The sophomore star isn't content with all this success, though, as she has even larger ambitions waiting in the horizon.

"I would like to make the NCAA's at least once in my four years here," she said. "Other than that, I would like to get into graduate school for my major, microbiology."

Despite a long history of tennis, Iwanowicz does not expect to continue her tennis career once she graduates — 17 years of competitive tennis is enough for her. Starting at the age of five, Dorothy was coached by her father in Weymouth until she eventually moved to the south at the age of 14.

She trained at a private tennis academy until she turned 18, when she decided to return north and play for Massachusetts.

"I really liked all the girls on the team," Iwanowicz said. "We really have great chemistry together."

Iwanowicz said that the person who has had the greatest influence on her this season has been junior Sasha Edelstein.

"She always gives her hardest, and never gives up," Iwanowicz said.

She also adds that coach Judy Dixon has helped mold her into the player she is today.

"She is really a tough coach, but in a good way. She keeps us in shape, and has shown that she really knows what she is talking about."

Iwanowicz is not the flashy person brimming with arrgance that one might expect of a star collegiate athlete and student.

She is quiet, but determined. She has worked hard over the years to get to where she is today, and she is deserving of everything she has earned: a great record, the A-10 Perfomer of the Week Award and a bright future in whatever she chooses.

But first, she has to tear through the rest of this year's competition.

Sox crush Orioles with 14-hit attack

By David Ginsburg

BALTIMORE – Johnny Damon went 5-for-5 with two RBIs, and the Boston Red Sox used a seven-run second inning to cruise past the Baltimore Orioles 10-3 Wednesday night.

David Ortiz homered and Kevin Millar had three hits for the Red Sox, who have won two straight after losing to Baltimore on opening night.

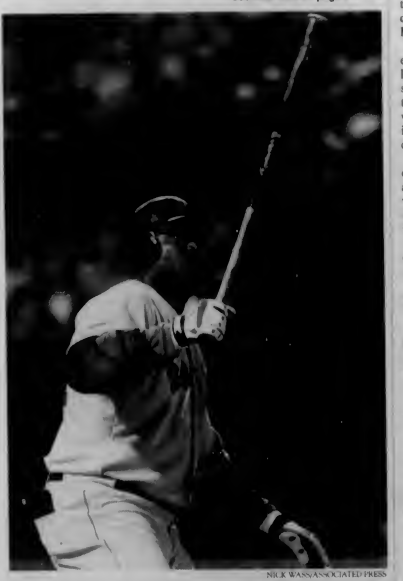
Orioles	3

The second-inning outburst featured six hits, three walks and three defensive lapses by the Orioles. The seven runs, all of which scored with two outs, were more than Boston tallied in its first two games combined.

Derek Lowe (1-0) allowed two runs and seven hits in six innings. He struck out three and walked two.

Damon, who entered 0-for-9 on the season, matched his career high for hits and raised his batting average to .357. He also scored two runs, stole a base and made an excellent catch to rob David Segui of a homer.

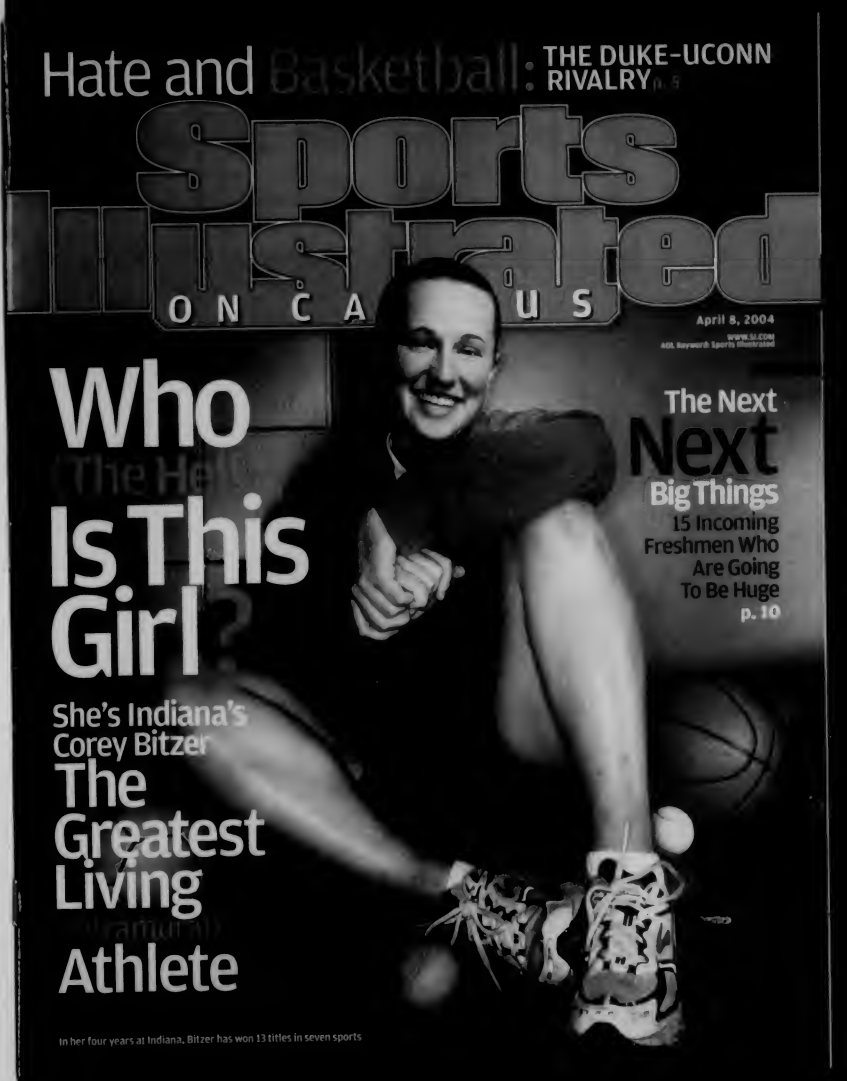
Millar led off the Boston second with a double off Kurt Ainsworth (0-1), making his first start with the Orioles. Jason Varitek then walked and Gabe Kapler hit into a double play.



After Mark Bellhorn drew a walk to put runners on first and second, Pokey Reese hit a grounder to shortstop Miguel Tejada, who looked at third before throwing to first base – too late to get Reese.

Damon then hit a single to left, and Varitek easily scored before Bellhorn slid under catcher Javy Lopez, who failed to control the throw from left fielder Larry Bigbie. Bill Mueller followed with a two-run single and Ortiz walked before Manny Ramirez hit a fly to center that Luis Matos misjudged, resulting in a two-run double.

Millar hit an RBI single before Rick Bauer struck out Varitek to end the inning.



Rafael Palmeiro singled in a run for Baltimore in the third, but Ortiz made it 10-1 in the sixth with his first homer, a

THE VIBE AT DUKE AND UCONN

HERE'S WHY I HATE...

College hoops' hottest rivalry crosses genders, regions and often the lines of civility

...DUKE

THE LINGERING THEME in Durham, N.C., these days is jealousy. Usually it's other schools that resent the Dookies when it comes to hoops (which, if I'm not mistaken, the Blue Devils believe they invented), yet now it's the Cameron Crazies who are obsessed with hating the Huskies.

Their vitriol dates back to 1999 and four infamous digits: 77–74. That was the result when the overrated Blue Devils were RIP'ped by Richard Hamilton and UConn in the men's final.

So then the geeks down in Durham foolishly reached for the apex (we don't say Summitt in Storrs) of women's hoops. They ran into a Yankee they couldn't defeat in UConn coach Geno Auriemma, who before their '03 duel in Durham tweaked the Blue(blood) Devils faithful by saying, "There are just as many Duke graduates waiting on tables as there is [sic] from any other school in the country. They may just be working at a better restaurant."

UConn then won 77–65. (Geno 2, Crazies 0.)

As for infamous digits: Fourteen years ago Christian Laettner banked in a last-second-of-overtime runner in the Elite Eight to KO us 79–78. That remains the most painful loss in Huskies history. Last Saturday we exorcised that defeat, knocking out Duke by the poetically perfect count of ... 79–78. —Matt Burke

Matt Burke, a journalism major at UConn, is associate sports editor for the Daily Campus.

...UCONN

WE REMEMBER the Meadowlands.

That was 1990, when Christian Laettner nailed a running, double-pumping jumper to send the Huskies home on the short end of a thrilling 79–78 game.

We remember St. Petersburg, too.

That was in '99, when the Blue Devils failed to defend their appellation as the nation's best team, losing to Connecticut in the national title game. No, Matt, I don't recall the score.

We moved on—leaning forward, not backward—an attitude that has led the Blue Devils to more Final Fours (10) in the past 19 years than the entire Big East has reached (seven) in that span.

Sure, we were chapped when UConn's Diana Taurasi beat out Alana Beard for the Naismith Award. And we can't stand Geno. (He's opening his own restaurant next year, and I guaran-damn-tee you no Duke alum will be working there.) But that's women's hoops.

On the men's side, we could care less about the vitriol emanating from Connecticut. Such animus comes from selective memory, as the Huskies wonder at themselves like the Narcissus of college hardwood. Remember this, UConn: This was your second Final Four; it was our second since 2001. —Mike Corey

COLLEGE STATION, TEXAS

Welcome to the best college baseball venue in the country, where aspiring big leaguers hope to go from "rags" to riches By Troy Miller

LOCATED SO DEEP IN THE heart of Texas that it may as well be the Lone Star State's mitral valve is College Station, home of Texas A&M. More than two thirds of the town's population of 67,890 is made up of A&M students, or Aggies, and when it comes to heart, few student bodies, if any, have more than they do.

The Aggies are nationally renowned for their pigskin passion, for such traditions as Midnight Yell Practice and the 12th Man. Where else do people assemble at midnight to scream themselves hoarse with absolutely no hope of spotting Dick Clark? But that's what you'll see if you attend Yell Practice, which draws 25,000-plus to Kyle Field on the eve of a football game. "Texas A&M," says former Arkansas and current Rice coach Ken Hatfield, "is the toughest place I have ever had to coach."

Football is more popular than brisket here, yet few outside of Aggieland know that College Station is also one of the most dreaded places for opponents to play in all of college baseball. On their home diamond, C.E. (Pat) Olsen Field, the Aggies are bolstered by a rowdy student section of 4,000 or so fans who position themselves above the visitors' dugout and are known as RAggies.

A&M in the p.m. The RAggies are respectful of the national anthem (above), but once Justin Ruggiano (below) and crew take the field, their loud, sometimes lewd antics are a source of Aggie ravation for visitors.

The name stems from the chants, or rags, that are used to relentlessly torment visiting teams. "Pinch his butt," for example, is yelled when the visiting coach makes a trip to the pitcher's mound. That is often followed by "tease," should the coach fail to follow through on the RAggies' dare.

Even quiet moments are ripe for rags. If the opposing team's first base coach stands outside of the coaching box, he'll be hearing "Get in the box" in his sleep. Of course, should he comply with that request, he will be showered with "Get out of the box." RAggie culture is not about being fair, after all.

A&M senior pitcher Justin Moore knows all about the RAggies. He was raised in a family of Aggies and sat in the student section as a youngster before coming to Aggieland to play baseball. "I like the rag when a guy hits the ball off his foot and they say 'Ow' every time he takes a step," Moore says. "My favorites are some of the original ones, where they come up with something from a guy's name, and they rag him about it the whole weekend."

Out past the leftfield wall is another popular student section, Aggie Alley, which is nothing more than a parking lot between Olsen Field and the Student Recreation Center. Students apply each winter to obtain a $50 parking spot there. The lucky lottery winners host barbecues and hold parties from the beds of pickup trucks or scaffolds built onto their cars, all the while ragging the opposing team's leftfielder.

Aggie Alley once was free and overflowed with raucous RAggies. The ragging is a little toned down there now that the number of students has dropped. The RAggies in the stands, however, continue to prove that Olsen Field is one of the true must-visit places in college baseball—unless your seats are in the visitors' dugout.

"When we play at places like Texas, they have a lot of fans, but it's mostly older people or alumni," Moore says. "They're not really into the game; they're just kind of watching. It's nothing like [Olsen Field]. We don't play anywhere in the country that has fans like we do."

Troy Miller, a graduate student majoring in kinesiology at Texas A&M, is the sports editor of The Battalion.

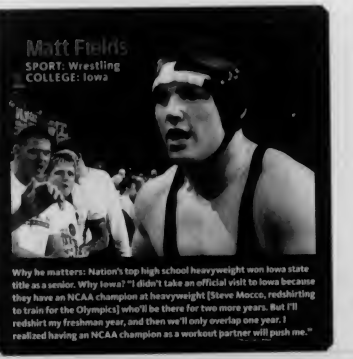
The Next Next Big Things

IN JANUARY WE UNVEILED the [illegible] football players for 2004. Now it's time to introduce the rest of the best prospects from next year's freshman class, names you'll soon be familiar with. —Matthew Waxman

Candace Parker

SPORT Basketball
COLLEGE Tennessee



PLJ (PEACE, LOVE AND Jump Shots) is how Naperville (Ill.) Central phenom Parker signs all of her correspondence. But Shaquille O'Neal's Shoot Pass Slam might be a better fit. And by slam, we're not talking about a dainty Lisa Leslie, sneak-the-ball-over-the-rim dunk; Parker can throw down with authority. The 6'3" senior showed off her hops last week when she bested a field of boys to win the slam dunk contest at the McDonald's All-American Game.

The victory was even more remarkable because Parker tore her left ACL last summer. "Before the injury, I was jumping like I never had before. During rehab I wondered, Will I ever be able to jump like that again?" she says. "I'm starting to get that back now."

Parker returned to action this winter in time to lead the Redhawks to 24 consecutive wins and a second straight state championship, averaging 24.3 points, 10.9 rebounds and 3.0 assists, and earning consensus national player of the year honors.

Last season she became the first junior to win the Naismith player of the year award. "She was doing things never seen before from a female player at any level," says Naperville Central coach Andy Nussbaum.

Parker's goal: to revolutionize women's hoops and change the perception that it is less athletic. "Knowing Candace, I would not bet against her," says Nussbaum. "She is a very determined and competitive young lady, and she loves dunking."

Why he matters: Nation's top high school heavyweight won Iowa state title as a senior. Why Iowa? "I didn't take an official visit to Iowa because they have an NCAA champion at heavyweight [Steve Mocco, redshirting to train for the Olympics] who'll be there for two more years. But I'll redshirt my freshman year, and then we'll only overlap one year. I realized having an NCAA champion as a workout partner will push me."

Ashlyn Harris

SPORT Soccer
COLLEGE North Carolina

Why she matters: Gatorade national player of the year. Starting goalkeeper for U.S. under-19 national team. Why UNC? "I always knew I was going to end up there. I love the atmosphere and how they develop great players."

Shaun Livingston

SPORT Basketball
COLLEGE Duke

Why he matters: Top point guard in class of 2004. May enter NBA draft, for which he's regarded as a possible lottery pick. On turning pro: "It depends what I hear close to the draft. You tell me I'm the first pick, then I'm gone."

Lindsey Nelson

SPORT Tennis
COLLEGE USC

Why she matters: The top high schooler (No. 7) in USTA girls' 18 singles rankings. On going to college: "It's better to go pro later. I think girls who go pro young get burnt out at a peak age of 21 or 22. But if I'm ready, and I have a top 100 ranking, I'll leave."

Ashley Postell

SPORT: Gymnastics
COLLEGE: Utah

Why she matters: 2002 world champion on balance beam. Likely member of 2004 U.S. Olympic team. Why Utah? "As soon as I went there I felt like I fit in. I went for three days during Halloween and went to a costume party. A lot of other people dressed up in some real crazy stuff." On college: "I get nervous being in a place where I don't know anyone, because at 5'2" I'm a lot smaller than everyone."

Kyle Buholz

SPORT: Swimming COLLEGE: Northwestern

Why he matters: Member of 2003 U.S. junior national team. Three-time Wisconsin swimmer of the year. On the recruiting process: "Other coaches would point out what their school had that no other school had. Northwestern's coaches didn't try to sell me on facilities or girls or parties. They told me how they could make me a better swimmer. And they told the school, not just the athletic program."

Jason Richardson

SPORT: Track and field
COLLEGE: South Carolina

Why he matters: Last summer won both the 110- and 400-meter hurdles at IAAF World Youth Championships. Named 2003 youth athlete of the year by USA Track & Field. On college: "I'm looking forward to getting away. High school can be so dry and banal." In five years: "Call me cocky, but I think it would take something bizarre for me not to be competing professionally."

Kevin Huntley

SPORT: Lacrosse
COLLEGE: Johns Hopkins

Why he matters: In 2003 was first junior named Maryland high school player of the year. Member of Canadian under-19 national team. On college: "I'm nervous about the change of pace in terms of academics. Hopkins isn't exactly a school where you can slack off." In five years: "It would be sweet to play lacrosse and get paid for it."

Why she matters: Utility is No. 1 recruit in the nation. Member of 2003 U.S. junior national team. Why UCLA? "I based my decision on the players who will be coming back, the coaching staff and the location—it's close to the national team training center. If the national team needs me to practice with them, I'm right there."

Why he matters: Speedy, skilled 5'8", 165-pound forward; son of future Hall of Fame defenseman Ray Bourque. Why BU? "The summer after my freshman year I went in for a visit, and they offered me a scholarship. I called back the next day and gave a verbal commitment. It was the only school I wanted to go to."

Meagan Denny

Why she matters: Top pitcher in class of 2004. Member of '03 U.S. junior national team. Why Texas? "When I went to Texas, I walked onto the field and it was all lit up, and they started blaring my favorite song, AC/DC's Thunderstruck, and the P.A. announcer said, 'Now pitching for the Longhorns, number 2, Meagan Denny.' Fireworks went off inside of me, and I started crying. I knew Texas was the place."

[illegible], but they aren't for everybody. For one, being a scholarship athlete requires an enormous time commitment: hours of practice, loads of travel, break-of-dawn training sessions. Then there's the whole "talent" issue; for some reason coaches expect you to be really, really good. So that necessitates even more practice, not to mention exemplary genes, sick hand-eye coordination and a lifestyle heavy on sleep and protein shakes and light on pepperoni pizza and all-night Madden 2004 tournaments. And who, really, wants to make those sacrifices?

If you are willing, stop reading right now. You won't understand. (And shouldn't you be out doing plyometrics in Lycra shorts anyway?) I'm talking to those of you who know you have the rest of your life to get up at the crack of dawn, so why do it in college; to the weekend warriors who believe sloshball should be an Olympic sport; and to all former high school jocks who loved the games but never saw the point of practice, especially running those ludicrous suicides. That's right, I'm talking to you, College IM Guy and College IM Gal.

The only problem with IM sports, of course, is how little glory they bestow. No one ever became BMOC by playing a mean second base in IM softball, and an intramural crowd generally consists of three drunk guys on their way home from happy hour. Rarely, if ever, does the campus paper cover IM exploits, and it's not as if a national magazine is going to write a story on you because you're a kickass dodgeball player.

Until now.

AT SIOC WE BELIEVE IT'S TIME for IM athletes to get their props. Far too long have their deeds gone unheralded. Duke hoopster J.J. Redick gets a haircut, and there are three stories in the paper, but every day some young man in a CONSERVE WATER, DRINK BEER T shirt hits a last-second buzzer beater to boost his dorm to victory, and not a sentence is written. It's a travesty.

So we put in a call to our campus correspondents to ferret out the greatest living IM player. There were plenty of worthy candidates, including Jeremy Kokemor of Virginia (who has won 15 championships in six sports), grad student Taryn Lynn of Tennessee (who won six titles in a single semester) and Amy Hardin Murphey of Ole Miss (who has competed in 15 sports), but one person stood out among the crowd: an IM goddess from Indiana University named Corey Bitzer. In her four years Bitzer has competed in 39 IM events (and counting), has won 13 championships and was IU's female IM athlete of the year as a junior. Add to that her dominating performances in the Little 500, the largest collegiate bike race in the country, and she was the obvious choice. But we could not honor her on résumé alone, so last week I headed to Bloomington to see this rec-league Renaissance woman in action.

On the day I visited, Bitzer was competing in the annual Little 500 individual time trial, which consists of one-mile sprint races. (Naturally, Bitzer took first place last year.) I arrived at her sorority house, Alpha Gamma Delta, at 5:30 p.m., and minutes later a green 1995 Dodge Caravan came hurtling into the parking lot. Bitzer popped her head out of the window and in one continuous breath said, "Hey-Chris-sorry-about-this-but-is-there-any-way-we-can-head-to-the-track-right-now-because-I-promised-a-teammate-I'd-time-her." It was not a question.

We peeled out of the parking lot and sped to the back entrance of the track. Bitzer jumped out of the car, sprinted to the (locked) gate and executed a nifty dive roll to shimmy underneath it. As I clambered over the fence with all the grace of a Labrador on a jungle gym, she was already long gone. By the time I caught up to her at the track, she was on the infield, psyching up Alpha Gamma Delta teammate Viki Hunziker, who was to race in the next heat.

It was a miserable afternoon, 36° and rainy. Most of the timers and supporters at the track were bundled up, many of them in blankets, but Bitzer was in shorts and a sweatshirt. Even at rest she looks like an athlete. About 5'4", she has brown hair that she pulls back into a very tight ponytail and the muscled legs of a speed skater. She spends most of her time smiling a sweet, shy smile, except when she's competing, whereupon she looks as if she's having a staring contest with a wall.

In high school Bitzer was a two-sport star at Naperville (Ill.) Central High, the current home of hoops phenom Candace Parker (page 10). Though recruited by smaller state schools for basketball, Bitzer chose Indiana in part because she thought she'd be able to walk on to the varsity. She did just that as a freshman but quit after only a month because of the time commitment and the probability of very little PT. Freed from hoops, she could now compete in half a dozen IM sports in the time it took her to play one intercollegiate season. So she started with basketball and softball and soccer. Floor hockey? Why not. Dodgeball? Bring it. She bowled (her average is in the 160s), played wide receiver on a coed flag football team and quarterback on a women's team (she won three titles in the coed league and two in the women's) and picked up cycling.

Bitzer had never biked competitively before, but as a freshman she became her team's best rider and was named Little 500 rookie of the year. As a sophomore she took third in the individual time trial (her team finished fourth), and last year, though her team slipped to seventh, she finished first in the time trial. Last month the Alpha Gamma Delta squad broke a 15-year-old course record in the qualifying trial (a record surpassed an hour later), in large part because Bitzer rode both first and fourth in the four-leg relay race, pedaling 40 of the 100 laps herself. AGD will be one of the favorites in the women's race on April 23.

Though she'd never biked competitively prior to arriving at IU, Bitzer quickly became a go-to rider in the Little 500, the nation's premier intramural event.

On the afternoon I came to town, Bitzer was hoping not only to defend her individual time trial title but also to break the course record, which stood at two minutes, 36 seconds. Her heat was to begin at 8:05 p.m., and by 7:45 it was not only dark and foot-stamping cold but also hailing. To warm up, Bitzer went into the women's bathroom to bike on stationary rollers. (Think of a bike on a treadmill.)

Bitzer spends one to two hours training each day, which is a bit worrisome. (IM sports, remember, are about not practicing.) For spring break she and her Alpha Gamma Delta teammates drove to Florida, which sounded encouraging until she told me they went there to train. To top it off, they stayed with Bitzer's grandparents. This veers awfully close to being too hard-core. Explained Bitzer, somewhat apologetically, "Every other team trains, too." Seeing that I wasn't moved by this, she added, "And we did go to the beach during the day."

We'll let her off the hook, in part because of the gigantic ness of the Little 500 and in part because she doesn't practice for other IM events. Her reason: She claims she doesn't need to. Now that's an IMer. After all, one of the integral elements of intramural success is cockiness.

Bitzer is also chock-full of IMing's other necessary trait: competitiveness. She doesn't play cards because she thinks there's "too much luck involved," finds softball boring because one person has too little control over a game's outcome and was in an avocado-growing contest with a friend. (Don't ask.) Outside of school Bitzer has run two marathons, completed an Ironman triathlon and biked from Indiana to Maine with a cycling team. Always looking for a bigger challenge, she says she prefers playing with guys because "the competition is much better. It gets frustrating playing with girls because they don't take it as seriously."

So you can imagine how pumped she was for this race. By 8:03 she was in her pink racing gear at the start line. On the far turn a swarm of about 40 AGDs huddled trackside, squealing, "We love you, Corey!" in what can only be described as the vocal equivalent of handwriting where the i's are dotted with little hearts. To break the course record Bitzer needed to cover the first lap in 41 seconds and average 38 seconds over the final three. She passed the pole in 40.41 on the opening lap.

Maybe it was the wet track, maybe she came out too fast, but her pace slowed on the final two laps, and she finished in 2:41.77. This left her in third place, but third wasn't good enough. Afterward, Bitzer stood among her sorority sisters and grimaced, mud splattered all over her face.

More bad news arrived: Her 10 p.m. Ultimate Frisbee game had been canceled. "Which sucks," she said as we walked, "because I would have been able to take out some aggression." Instead, she headed to Taco Bell with Hunziker. On the drive back from the border, I asked what they'd do that night. "Well," replied Hunziker, "like most nights, everyone will be trying to study and Corey will start Rollerblading down the halls or trying to get a hall football game going." Hunziker paused. "And then she'll start tackling people. Corey's into spontaneous tackling."

Spontaneous tackling. It has a nice ring to it, doesn't it? Players could get points for every surprise takedown. Just imagine: You're walking into philosophy class when—Boom!—somebody blindsides you into a bookshelf of Kierkegaard. Or you're just taking your first bite of a burrito when—Smack!—your buddy goes Jevon Kearse on your ass. Sounds like an IM possibility to us. And no doubt, were it to become one, Corey Bitzer would be the first to sign up.

Intramural Nation

► BEST IM PROGRAM

NOTRE DAME
With roughly 6,000 participants, the 60-sport intramural program at Notre Dame helps instill the Irish with their fighting spirit. Competing in Bookstore Basketball, the Bengal Bouts or full-pad tackle football is sometimes worth more than a letter jacket. "Notre Dame varsity sports don't attract as many students as they'd like because students would rather play intramurals than watch from the [varsity] sidelines," says Richard O'Leary, director of intramurals. Rudy always said if he could do it over again, he would have gone out for broomball.

► BEST IM EVENTS

THE LITTLE 500, Indiana
How many other intramural events have inspired an Oscar-winning film (Breaking Away) and been televised on ESPN?

OOZEBALL, UConn
With blaring music and knee-deep slush, this mud volleyball tournament is like Woodstock with a competitive element and has inspired countless knockoffs such as the Louisiana-Monroe version.

CHILI COOK-OFF, Boise State
Technically not a sport, but the postgame race to the bathroom certainly qualifies.

CANE SPREE, Princeton
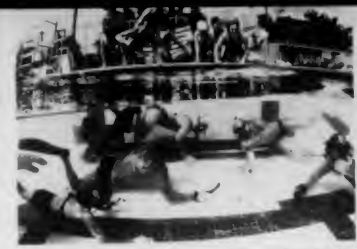
Dating back to 1865, the nation's oldest IM event pits freshmen against sophomores in several competitions. The highlight is cane wrestling, which evolved from a century-old tradition of sophomores snatching walking canes from freshmen they deemed undeserving.



UL-Monroe students get down and dirty in the sport made famous at UConn.

► WEIRDEST IM SPORTS

FLAG FLOOPBALL
Western Carolina
A women-only version of flag football, played with a red playground ball that is allowed to bounce once.

FLICKERBALL, Florida State
A hybrid sport that is perhaps best described as rugby played on a basketball court.

Though it's primarily a club sport in the Lower 48, our neighbors to the north (and a single school in frigid Alaska) immerse themselves in underwater hockey.

PHEASANT HUNTING
Pratt (Kans.) CC
The winner, such as it were, is the student who bags the bird with the longest tail feather. And, no, you don't have to shake it.

UNDERWATER HOCKEY
Sheldon Jackson (Sitka, Alaska)
Players outfitted in snorkel gear attempt to push a weighted puck across the bottom of a pool and into an unguarded nine-foot-wide goal.

WALLYBALL, Michigan
Volleyball on a racquetball court. The ball is bouncy, and under certain conditions the walls and ceiling are in play. —Matthew Waxman

MIRACLE

Once upon a time, the University of Minnesota was a scandal-plagued, one-sport school. A bunch of girls have changed all that

NOT SO LONG AGO, the list of Minnesota's legendary babes read like this: Mary Tyler Moore, Winona Ryder, Marge Gunderson, Jane Russell (ask your grandpa), Paul Bunyan's blue ox and maybe Prince. But that was before the University of Minnesota sent three different distaff teams to Final Fours in the last four months. Now, Minnesota's babe quotient is beginning to rival its lake quotient.

It all began back in mid-December when the Golden Gophers women's volleyball team, which had opened the season 0-4, advanced to that sport's Final Four. Minnesota lost to eventual national champ USC, but, among other plaudits, Paula Gentil was named a second team All-America after setting a Big Ten single-season record for digs, with 656. Then again, isn't digging what Gophers do best?

As it turns out, no.

For, in the early winter, the women's hockey team was skating to a 12-0-1 start. The women's basketball team was even better, opening up 15-0.

The hockey team's leading scorer was home-grown (Brooklyn Park) forward Krissy Wendell, who previously had been one of five girls to play in the 1994 Little League World Series; she later earned a hockey silver medal at the 2002 Winter Olympics in Salt Lake City. The hoops team is also led by a native, guard Lindsay Whalen (Hutchinson), who is more popular here than July.

A pucks title was sweet, but the real buzz at the U was in women's hoops.

Three years ago, when Whalen was a freshman, the Gophers drew 1,087 fans per game. When school officials asked where that attendance ranked nationally, the NCAA replied that it only keeps rankings for the top 100 schools. Oh. This winter the Gophers averaged 9,703 fans per game (seventh nationally) at Williams Arena, a.k.a. the Barn.

Minnesota hasn't been this amped about college sports since Hayden Fox led the Screaming Eagles to the Popcorn Bowl. Whalen, the school's alltime leading scorer among men or women, is the first U of M athlete to have her own bobblehead doll, which sold out. Her number 13 jersey is the most popular item of its kind at Gold Country, the Gophers merchandise mecca.

On March 28 the women's hockey team defeated Harvard, 6-2, to win its first NCAA title (and the first in any NCAA sport for a Minnesota women's team). Wendell was named Most Outstanding Player of the tournament. Two nights later her hoops sisters played top-ranked Duke in the Mideast Regional final. "Even a two-hour physics lab couldn't keep us from watching that game," says student Kelly Pearson. "We watched on our laptops."

The Gophers won, 82-75, and at press time were preparing to face two-time defending national champion UConn in the Final Four. For a basketball squad that finished 8-20 in 2000-01, this is unbelievable, but then the Gophers women are making a habit of turning Minnesota upside down. And that is poetic. After all, when you turn an M upside down, what do you get? G

Charter passed

ALANA Affairs sees official decision

By MELISSA BLANKSTEEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A new Charter for the Office of ALANA Affairs was approved by the Senate Wednesday during the Student Government Association's weekly meeting.

"I am not either excited or disappointed, just glad that we finally got to go over [the Charter] and make a decision," Senator Gladys Franco said. "It's been a long, long process."

The Charter had been brought to the Senate three times and was sent back to the Administrative Affairs committee twice, where it has been discussed since last semester. It was on last week's agenda, but because of the election ratification, it was not heard until Wednesday.

One of the most contested points was if the vice chancellor of student affairs and campus life should get to appoint a faculty member to the advisory board from a pool of five candidates that the ALANA Caucus would recommend. This issue had sent the Charter back to committee once, and many felt frustrated that it was brought up again on Wednesday.

Senator Brian Roberts was a proponent of this appointment. He said repeatedly that he believed this would help keep the lines of communication open between the OAA and the Vice Chancellor's Office.

"We're not losing control, or even who these people are going to be ... This is only helping the office. I just can't see how this is not beneficial," he said at Wednesday's meeting.

Franco disagreed.

She said that most of her constituents felt that the vice chancellor should not have an appointment because the ALANA Caucus has appointed their own seats to the advisory board for more than 25 years. The Charter was passed without this appointment.

The big difference between this Charter and the last one is an increased SGA involvement, according to Franco.

The advisory board will consist of 10 members: the liaison between the Caucus and the OAA who will serve as chair, the SGA President, one undergraduate to be appointed by the President and Senate, three undergraduate students to be appointed by the President, Senate, and the Caucus, three University staff members, and the Director of OAA who will not have a vote.

Michael Gargano, the vice chancellor of student affairs and campus life, said in an email that as long as it agrees with the bylaws, then the Charter is fine.

"Student Government is education in action," he wrote. "If students feel they would prefer to have student appointments only then that is their prerogative. Students holding fellow students accountable is good. The main requirement is for everyone to uphold the SGA Constitution and bylaws."

The next steps are for Interim-President Jared Nokes and Gargano to approve the Charter.

Most of the ALANA Caucus members have not yet seen the Charter, according to Senator Pavel Payano. Today they will have a meeting where he said they will discuss it. He believes that many individuals will be pleased with it.

"It's something that the ALANA members in the undergraduate community, they like it this way," he said, "so hopefully it'll pass through [Nokes and Gargano] and we won't have to work on it for a long, long time."

"This is a student-run organization since the beginning and it should stay that way," Payano said.

The OAA is funded from the Student Activities Fees and is an agency of the SGA.

Insurgents threaten to kill hostages

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — In a dramatic video released yesterday, insurgents revealed they had kidnapped three Japanese and threatened to burn them alive in three days unless Japan agrees to withdraw its troops from Iraq.

Armed with assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades, the kidnappers shouted "Allahu akbar" — God is great — in the video and held knives to the throats of the Japanese, who screamed and whimpered in terror.

Japan's government said it has no plans to pull troops out of Iraq in response to the threat, which came amid a series of other kidnappings targeting civilians.

Two Arab residents of east Jerusalem — one an Israeli citizen working for a U.S. aid group — and seven South Korean Christian missionaries were detained Thursday, though the Koreans were released.

A Canadian humanitarian aid worker for the International Rescue Committee was taken hostage Wednesday by a local militia in Najaf, southern Iraq, the agency said Thursday. Fadhl Ihsan Fadel was the first Canadian to be abducted in Iraq, Canadian Foreign Affairs spokesman Sameer Ahmed said in Toronto.

The events suggested a new tactic by insurgents to pressure the governments of Washington's allies in Iraq, and posed dire implications for U.S. workers, journalists, religious groups, security personnel and other civilians doing business here.

New construction for campus in the works

At the faculty senate meeting, Jim Cahill, Director of Facilities and Campus Planning, announces possible future plans for the UMass campus.

A massive construction project at the University of Massachusetts is now underway, according to a Capital Plan presentation at the Faculty Senate Meeting yesterday.

Jim Cahill, the director of the Facilities and Planning Division of the Physical Plant, announced yesterday the upcoming plans for the university. For the next four years the university has allocated $536 million planned in project spending.

"In short, the money will go to new construction, repairs and renovations for academics and student life," Cahill said.

One of the major construction projects is a $91 million heating plant, which will be built on the old outdoor track and will eventually replace the current plant.

"The permit process alone for the plant is two years," Cahill said, "it will provide five times more electric current than the current one and it will be the cleanest plant in the country if not the world."

Cahill also mentioned that the plant designers are requesting it to be built to a "technologically impossible" standard to ensure cleanliness and efficiency.

In addition to the new heating plant, the Capital Plan includes the construction of three major new buildings.

"We have a great deal of money going into academic projects," he said, "academic projects that will go directly into research and laboratories."

A new science lab is in the designing phase right now that will include an advanced weather tracking system that will show advanced warning for extreme weather conditions like tornados. The lab will also include 30,000 square feet of research space and a 250-seat lecture hall.

The plan also includes another arts building that set to be built on North Pleasant St. across from the Fine Arts Center. This new building will include a three-dimensional structure inside the building and 45,000 square feet of studios and classrooms in total.

Both the new science lab and the art center are slated for completion in 2007.

The third new major construction is an addition and major renovation to Skinner Hall.

The addition will house the school of nursing and provide state-of-the-art working facilities in the labs.

"We're really excited about the three building projects," Cahill said. "It's a wonderful opportunity to strengthen the visual unity of North Pleasant St."

The Facilities Planning Division plans to host a designer collaboration on all of the project designs.

"We're trusting [designers], so [by] hosting a collaboration, we can wind up with a better overall image," Cahill said.

Perhaps the most major plans deal with student housing and student affairs. By 2006, the directors hope to have completed new replacements to the campus center that include new windows, new plumbing, a new roof and a new elevator.

To alleviate the space crunch in housing, 1,500 new beds are among the plans. In fact an entire new residential area is in the works.

"We want to develop a housing area on the ridge between Orchard Hill and Sylvan residential areas with a well lit safe path and to create an entire residential community," Cahill said.

The new housing facility would potentially join Sylvan and Orchard Hill together as one larger residential area.

Cahill also mentioned that some of the most important, time-consuming and costly renovations are the ones that cannot be seen.

"It doesn't seem very important, but it's very exciting," Cahill said.

Some infrastructure changes include new fire alarm systems and several buildings, elevators, landscaping updates near the library and exterior repairs on Bartlett and Goodell buildings. The plans, however, did raise some questions about the longevity of the buildings.

Rice says U.S. 'not on war footing' before 9-11

By TERENCE HUNT
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON (AP) — Under sharp questioning, national security adviser Condoleezza Rice insisted yesterday that President Bush fully understood the threat of terrorism before Sept. 11, 2001, but no intelligence foretold the deadliest attack ever on American soil.

Disputing criticism that Bush was negligent, Rice told a national commission "there was no silver bullet that could have prevented" the attacks that killed nearly 3,000 people in New York, Washington and Pennsylvania.

Broadcast live around the world, the hearing turned contentious as Democratic members questioned why alarms didn't ring when Bush was presented with an Aug. 6, 2001, classified memo entitled "Bin Laden determined to attack inside United States."

Former Sen. Bob Kerrey, a Democratic member of the commission, described the memo as saying that "the FBI indicates patterns of suspicious activity in the United States consistent with preparations for hijacking."

Rice dismissed the document as "historical information based on old reporting" and said it did not warn of attacks inside the United States. But she acknowledged it did reveal the FBI had 70 field investigations under way involving al-Qaida in the United States.

Commission members unanimously asked the White House to declassify the memo, whose title had not been revealed previously. The White House said it would be declassified — but not on Thursday.

Relatives of victims killed on Sept. 11 sat in the audience behind Rice, scribbling notes and shaking their heads at times as she rebutted accusations by former counterterrorism aide Richard Clarke that Bush had fumbled opportunities to eliminate al-Qaida.

Unlike Clarke, Rice offered no apology for the government's failure to prevent the attacks.

Iconic photography examined in talk

By MEGAN DALEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

An Indiana University professor spoke yesterday about the impact of iconic photographs on a liberal-democratic society.

John Louis Lucaites gave his talk, "Liberal Representation and Global Order: The Iconic Photograph from Tiananmen Square," to approximately 60 students and professors. He was introduced by Professor Stephen Olbrys, a former student and one of the members of the Communication Department that brought Lucaites to the University of Massachusetts.

An iconic photograph, according to Lucaites, is one that is "widely recognized across the public culture, is understood to be a primary representation of historically significant events, activates a strong emotional identification or response and are reproduced across a range of media, genres and topics."

He gave several examples of these photos, including the picture of the flag being raised over Iwo Jima, the picture of a girl walking away from an accidental napalming in Vietnam and the firemen on 9/11, raising a flag over debris on Ground Zero.

Another example that Lucaites talked about was the picture of a sailor returning home from World War II and kissing a nurse in Times Square. He used this picture to show how an iconic photograph is often parodied and copied because of its fame. He showed ads that imitated the style of the icon, as well as political cartoons and an episode of "The Simpsons" that parodied the picture.

The main photograph of Lucaites' lecture was a picture taken in Tiananmen Square in China. The picture shows a line of tanks stopped in front of one, unidentified man. According to Lucaites, this photograph is touted as a picture of liberalism, "one man against the army, an individual who is standing up against the machinations of a dictatorship."

However, the photo has been taken out of context, Lucaites said. At Tiananmen Square, a month-long demonstration was made against the communist government in China. This demonstration of more than a million Chinese people ended when tanks and soldiers attempted to disperse the crowd, killing many and injuring a number of protesters.

The picture was published in western papers and was used as a symbol of dissent. The unknown man in a picture was raised to the level of a hero "as important as William Churchill, James Joyce and Albert Einstein," Lucaites said.

Though this photograph is touted as a picture of democracy Lucaites said "the political protests were actually unsuccessful." Instead of being a symbol of what happened in China, this picture is taken by western cultures to portray their own ideals of democracy.

Because of this, Lucaites doesn't believe that this picture is so much a democratic picture but a liberal picture. "The man in the picture is dressed regularly and holding a shopping bag; he is a consumer." This emphasis on consumerism, Lucaites believes, is a liberal trait.

Lucaites concluded his lecture with a question and answer session that turned into a

Kerry: Bush should ask for international help

By NEDRA PICKLER

MILWAUKEE (AP) — As the Bush administration and military commanders considered whether to send more troops to Iraq to deal with rising violence, Democrat John Kerry said President Bush should ask other countries for help.

"I believe it is the role of the president of the United States to maximize the ability to be successful and to minimize the cost to the American people, both financially and in lives," Kerry said Thursday in Wisconsin.

"That's common sense," he said. "And here today once again, we are asking the question, Why is the United States of America almost alone in carrying this burden and the risks which the world has a stake in?"

As Kerry, the presumed Democratic presidential nominee spoke, U.S. forces battled Shiite Muslim militants and Sunni insurgents in Iraq. The violence has claimed nearly three dozen American lives since last weekend, and Kerry cited television images of bloody U.S. soldiers.

"I hope that in the days ahead common sense and humility will begin to emerge in the approach of our nation and our policy so that we do not see month after month of these images and difficulties," Kerry said.

Bush campaign spokesman Steve Schmidt said Kerry should have spoken out against those who are waging violence in Iraq but that he chose instead to "play politics."

"John Kerry's political attacks are not a strategy to win the war on terror," Schmidt said.

Kerry, a Massachusetts senator, said the United States should engage in a "bold, clear, startlingly honest" appeal to share the decision-making and responsibility for Iraq. "Leadership also requires that we ask the right questions and that we put forward the right policies for our country," he said.

Kerry commented on Iraq before touting his economic plan at

During a question-and-answer session with the audience, the daughter of 1972 Democratic presidential nominee George McGovern, Susan, warned Kerry about opposition from independent candidate Ralph Nader. She said many in Wisconsin want to hear "strong statements" against Bush's foreign policy and environmental record.

"You tell me if this is strong enough," Kerry replied. "George Bush and the Republicans in Washington today have run the most arrogant, inept, reckless and ideological foreign policy in the modern history of this country."

Kerry deflected a question about national security adviser Condoleezza Rice's testimony before the 9-11 commission, saying he hoped her appearance "contributed to our finding out what we need to do to protect the security of our country." He said he would not comment on individual testimony before the commissioners have finished their report.

gunmen for brief periods in the past — usually in robberies — and Iraqi citizens have been kidnapped and held for ransom by criminals. But this was the first time foreigners have been snatched for political reasons, and the first such dramatic video ultimatum.

The Arabic TV station Al-Jazeera, broadcasting to Iraq and the rest of the Arab world, aired portions of the video of the Japanese hostages released by a previously unknown group calling itself the "Mujahedeen Squadrons." It showed two men and one woman surrounded by gunmen wearing black, and close-ups of the captives' passports.

Al-Jazeera editors said the three were taken hostage in southern Iraq, where black-clad Shiite militiamen have been engaged in an uprising this week. The exact date of their capture was not known.

Japanese troops are based outside the southern Iraqi city of Samawah.

Associated Press Television News obtained a copy of the full video, in which four masked men point knives and swords at the blindfolded captives as they lie on the floor of a room with concrete walls.

At one point, a gunman holds a knife to the throat of one of the men, whose blindfold has been removed; his eyes widen in panic and he struggles to try to get free. The woman screams and weeps.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Rice testimony fails to give any real answers

National Security advisor Condoleezza Rice yesterday appeared in front of the panel investigating the events that led up to Sept. 11. The testimony comes after much debate and criticism from republicans and democrats alike requesting that Rice provide public testimony to the commission.

The room was filled with panel members and photographers, all waiting to hear Rice give specific reasons why the events of 9/11 took place. Unfortunately, no such answers were given.

Rice spent nearly three hours in front of a panel that looked more like a firing squad than a commission, constantly barraging Rice with heated and complex questions. Admittedly, Rice handled every question in a calm, unfazed manner, even when "allegations" were of a highly personalized and accusatory manner.

But while Rice may have exuded a great deal of pose in her testimony, nothing of substantial value was said.

Rice opened her testimony with a lengthy opening statement that more closely resembled a condensed history lesson. References made to Nazi Germany and the Treaty of Versailles may have sounded good, but in reality it was a sign of things to come, as Rice gave ambiguous and indirect answers for nearly the entire three-hour session.

One of the main topics of discussion was an intelligence memo that was presented to President Bush approximately one month before the 9/11 attacks occurred. The document mentioned Osama bin Laden, al Qaeda and possible hijackings. Despite requests to the contrary, the White House has refused to declassify the memo.

The conversation on the memo, and on most other topics covered during the testimony, was primarily made up of back-and-forth, "he said-she said" rhetoric.

"[The memo] did not warn of attacks inside the United States," Rice said. "It was historical information based on old reporting."

In response, Bob Kerrey, a Democratic commissioner, said that the memo informed President Bush "that the FBI indicates patterns of suspicious activity in the United States consistent with preparations for hijacking."

While she was exiting the hearing room, Rice shook the hands of family members who lost loved ones back on 9/11, and even hugged a few as well. Some, however, refused to be consoled by Rice, and could be seen shaking their heads as Rice's testimony was being read.

If any of those in attendance who lost family members on the day of the attacks were looking for an apology from Rice, they were disappointed. Rice gave no such apology, which is in contrast to former White House counterterrorism adviser Richard Clarke. Clarke apologized several times during an appearance two weeks ago.

Apologies and confessions were not on Rice's agenda. Instead, she dodged direct questions, tiptoed around the issues, and did exactly what she needed to do to prevent herself, President Bush and others in charge of looking guilty.

Perhaps there was no "silver bullet," as Rice said, that could have prevented the 9/11 attacks from happening. And certainly Rice, or anyone else at the White House couldn't have "moved heaven and Earth" to eliminate the terrorist threat. However, that doesn't mean the American public does not have a right to know exactly what happened leading up to the 9/11 tragedy.

Combating alcohol culture

Andrew Tibbs

As a student member of the Chancellor's Alcohol Task Force, I came to realize during my participation in this diverse body of educators, students, health care providers, mental health specialists, police and administrators was that nothing we were doing was in any way geared towards diminishing student rights. What we came to recognize as a group was that this university has a problem, a big one, with alcohol.

We realized that alcohol has created a culture at this university; it has created a myth that anything fun has to involve alcohol in some way, that to be cool you have to be willing to consume alcohol. This myth is dangerous, and often leads to illegal and counterproductive activities that can only harm and not help the students involved.

To imply that the task force acted to diminish student rights would speak falsely and offer the worst kind of insult to a group of people, including myself and the other student members, that only has the best interests of the student body in mind. It is the safety and security of the population at UMass that we are trying to address.

The task force itself was a diverse campus cross section, including students from the beginning of the process to the end from both inside and outside the Student Government Association. Each member was given an equal opportunity to be part of every discussion and every meeting. Every voice was heard equally.

As a student, my recommendations and ideas were perhaps even more important to the group, my opinion was frequently asked for, and I was a full member of the team that drafted the final report for presentation to the Chancellor. The group was independent of the administration and no one was getting paid to be there. We conducted our own lengthy research in a number of different relevant areas and after more than a year of careful consideration proposed, independently, recommendations that we felt as a group would begin to address the negative issues of the alcohol culture at this university.

To say that student interests or opinions were not asked for or represented in the task force is an outright lie. Beyond the three of us that were part of the group itself, students were both the primary subjects and primary administrators of many of the surveys conducted and reviewed by the task force and minutes of every meeting were delivered to the president of the student senate.

It is a shame that only the aspects of the final document that could be spun negatively were shared with the students of the university. Defeating recommendations of the report became nothing more than campaign promises of SGA members who are catering to the flawed culture as it is instead of striving to change it and truly improve student's lives here at UMass. The SGA should be working to open discussions of this issue to everyone, to create more alcohol free programming, to lead the charge to free our university from its often publicly embarrassing dependence on drinking and partying. This would be an example of true leadership instead of leaders choosing to follow an old and tired example.

It is a terrible tragedy and an affront to the spirit of this project that... such a one-sided version of the complete picture has been shared with the student body.

It is a terrible tragedy and an affront to the spirit of this project that while the task force struggled to be diverse and represent all aspects of campus populations equally, such a one-sided version of the complete picture has been shared with the student body. With the picture so murky and misrepresentation so rampant is a lot easier to see why the whole project has been misunderstood. Never once was I asked by any student organization or for that matter anyone outside the task force about my role in the task force. Odd when you consider how big an issue student representation in such groups has become.

I am not that hard to locate; my name was figured prominently on the front page of the document publicly submitted to the chancellor. I can only conclude that the reason for this omission is simply that no one wanted to find out the whole truth. In this action the only thing that we are being true to is the culture that the task force is trying to combat, simply dismissing or ignoring a problem that so clearly exists.

Ladies and gentlemen of UMass, let me point out to you that the best way of keeping the very rights that you cherish is by exercising them, by considering an issue in its entirety, opening it up for debate amongst an educated body and as a result making an educated decision on the subject.

Conflict and discussion are an important part of any project such as this. Equally, so is truth. My partners and I on the task force considered, discussed, dismissed, consolidated, wrote and rewrote the recommendations. Each was carefully structured specifically to target the campus alcohol problem, not students' rights. We believe with these recommendations that we can truly start to address the problem but we all participated in this endeavor knowing full well that we are not the be all end all.

I as a student and a member of the task force challenge the remainder of the UMass population to take what we have started and to talk about it, discuss it, learn the whole truth, admit that a problem exists and do what you can to fix it. Don't let a persistent culture steer your perspective without first opening your mind.

Remembering the outback

Adrienne Bossi

For a little over four months I have been putting off organizing the heaping mass of photographs from my five months abroad in Australia. As I begin the long and arduous task of organizing 32 rolls of film, I can't help but reminisce.

I can't help but think about what I was doing at this mid semester point half a year ago when I went on a much different spring break trip than this March's jaunt to Minnesota.

I was booked with Cape Trib Connections (short for Cape Tribulation, the Australian rain forest) to go on a three-day outback safari into the lava tubes, gold mining, and then onto the tableland areas of northeastern Australia's interior. Like my trip to Minnesota to visit friends from my semester abroad, my Australian spring break in October was my chance to get away from the monotony of daily life.

The uniformity was beginning to gnaw at my sanity.

But my bag was so heavy.

No, I can't just call it heavy. It was a three-foot tall hulking mass of my life zippered in a backpacker's holy grail of a bag. So much for getting away when I brought every worldly possession with me.

I moved in slow motion while the rest of the world looked on in awe as I lugged my bag the 12 feet from the hostel front desk to the four-wheel drive land rover minibus. With arms of rubber, I strained to heave it onto the olive green trailer.

Heath, our driver and senior guide, introduced himself like a 13-year old boy in a symphony of voice squeaks and pitch changes. The other guide, Dan, bellowed his introduction in an Australian accent thick enough to require sub titles.

Then all of the passengers had a turn to tell their story. "State your name, age, and occupation," Dan said while smiling at his witticism.

There were the two Belgian guys, Renalto and Tiery. Renalto had a goatee that was an act of God, a perfect equilateral triangle.

Each corner appeared to be an exact 60-degree angle. I caught myself staring at this marvelous geometric accomplishment growing on his face while formulating grand schemes of how I could sneak up to him with a protractor to determine the precise angles in which his stubble grew.

My turn.

We had said goodbye to the past paved road we would see for three days. It didn't take long for my back to stiffen and my knees to bruise from jostling against the "seat" in front of me.

"Hi," I said. "I'm the token American female who over packed. Please spare me from your blonde jokes."

Then there were the two English chaps, Allister and Martin, fondly nicknamed "the pomes." "'Pome' I'll explain for the dumb Americans on board," Allister playfully said as he winked my way, "is pronounced POM-eee and stands for prisoners of mother England."

Then Martin introduced himself. He said he was a computer programmer, but I think he really meant to say he was a pervert. Martin was just reaching the beginning stages of what I predict to be a long and arduous mid-life crisis. He was constantly trying to hold conversations with my breasts. Numerous times he tried to prove to himself that he still had game, that women wanted him, and most importantly that he certainly was not a middle-aged balding man with transparent skin and squat hands with Twinkies for fingers.

After the introductions, I climbed into the dusty bus and sat down on the slab of steel covered in worn brown leather called a "seat." We were instantly enemies. This "seat" was to bear the imprint of my behind by the end of the three-day safari.

Shortly after boarding the bus, we had said goodbye to the last paved road we would see for three days. It didn't take long for my back to stiffen and my knees to bruise from jostling against the "seat" in front of me. My porthole of a window let the dust from the road billow into my eyes and up my nostrils. The radio fought hard to play Bruce Springsteen over the nose of the truck driving over the bumpy dirt path.

That day, the sun was shining at a blistering 96 degrees. The air was as dry as an asthmatic's cough.

It was perfect.

This is just what I wanted — a total getaway from the monotony and luxuries of daily life. The wind was in my hair. I had sweat on my brow and dirt under my fingernails. There wasn't a toilet for a hundred miles. I was in the middle of nowhere with seven strangers from around the globe driving a roundtrip total of 1,000 miles through bush fires, rainforest, dried up waterways, and outback all while towing a pack heavy enough to be concealing a human carcass.

And I loved every second of it.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

UNHEALTHY AGGRESSION

We are writing in response to the article by Thomas Naughton,

"America's New War Front," published on April 7. This article caught our attention because the title suggested to us that it would be meaningfully connected to current world events. However, we almost immediately realized it was not.

Naughton's fight seems to be with his own unhealthy behaviors, attitudes and prejudices. While Naughton admits that he is an exercise addict, he is far from being a healthy example for aspiring exercisers. His obsessive running schedule and the resulting negative physical effects on his body (for example, vomiting on a regular basis) should not be looked to as being a model for anyone.

Naughton implies that he is a knowledgeable exerciser who is able to critique his fellow athletes' gym habits, yet it is clear that Naughton himself should consider getting a personal trainer. While he repeatedly states that the women who attend his gym do not know how to correctly use the gym equipment (specifically the elliptical machine which appears to be the center of Naughton's world) he does not seem to want to broaden his horizons beyond this illustrious elliptical machine. This ignorance about appropriate and healthy training puts Naughton in the same category as those gym-goers whom he despises.

Intriguingly enough, the majority of Naughton's insults are directed at women. The only two sections of the female population Naughton seems to recognize are the "baby-weight women ...[who] are mad as hell" and the elderly women who are racist and "strange and terrible." Naughton makes no mention of whether or not the "orange-skinned girl[s] of Southwest or a sorority" are seen at the gym. This complete disregard for female athletes is unfair, sexist, and just incorrect.

Naughton may have intended this article to be an amusing commentary on the state of today's gyms, however, his sexist and ageist attitudes permeate the article and make it impossible for many people to see any humor in it.

The authors of this letter hope that Thomas Naughton is able to develop a more healthy relationship with exercise and quell his violent and discriminatory tendencies.

FOOLISH EDITORIALS

After reading a delightfully humorous article on the April 1, I came to realize that I had passed the section of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian dedicated to parody and was then reading a completely serious piece by the campus propagandist, Gilad Skolnick.

In "A most unnatural logic," Skolnick seems to defer to the reasoning of Member Knesset — Israel's parliament Ze'ev Boim – who believes that violence is inherent in Palestinian blood. The crux of his article suggests that the Palestinian people, like others who have dealt with long bouts of oppression, should shut up and take their Israeli-imposed suffering like those who are exceedingly ignored by the world community. After all, if the Palestinian people made no issue, violent or peaceful, of Israeli actions, than Gilad and organizations like the Anti-Defamation League could appear to have legitimate claims about Israel's benignity.

Something that he did forget to mention, however, is that those other populations are not exactly hallmark examples of success in their efforts to attain autonomy, nor do they have to deal with Ariel Sharon — that portly and lovable fascist character who takes pride in executing a wheelchair bound spiritual leader, family and friends after prayer; the same Hamas leader who was apprehended in the past by a much less drastic procedure.

Of course, I agree that any instances like his mischaracterized nightclub anecdote are deplorable, and, yes, I think that suicide bombings are an improper response to arbitrary missile attacks and apologies for mistaken assassinations, but taking it on the chin is kind of a bummer too. Should the Palestinians return to the wonderfully peaceful days of increased Israeli settlement building? Their voice was about as loud as a whisper then. While they progressively lost more and more of their homeland, they were further marginalized, and Israeli settlements kept expanding.

Sure it would be nice to see peace, but it can't be a one-sided endeavor. Suicide bombers will probably continue to self-detonate so long as precision Israeli munitions take Palestinian children to their graves. So while Gilad reels over possible explanations why the Kurds, Tibetans and Igbo-Biafrans do not blow themselves up against their respective enemies (who, incidentally, were all living in similar regions at the beginning of their conflicts), perhaps people with a more mature and ostensibly less racist agenda will venture to determine how Palestinians and Israelis can stop responding to each other with such devastating attacks.

'Fight Night' gives boxing games a fighting chance

Press Start to Play

Reid Davenport

Since "Mike Tyson's Punch-Out" there has not been a boxing game that gamers that aren't even boxing fans would enjoy. There have been plenty of attempts at creating a decent boxing game, but most have only been sub par. EA's "Fight Night 2004" is a boxing game that almost breaks this long wait for a boxing game everyone can enjoy.

"Fight Night" is probably the most detailed boxing game in a long time. The graphics are really nice and like in most EA games, the graphics add a realistic quality to the game. Your boxer will move, punch and take hits just like in a real boxing match.

The difficulty is very high for a game that has been advertised enough for even non-boxing fans to want to give it a shot. Don't expect to be able to dive right into career mode and blast away opponents, as it is quite difficult to learn the controls. You also won't be doing any button mashing like in other boxing games. You will use one analog-stick to move your fighter while using the other one to punch. Landing good punches to take out your opponent will be very difficult until you've played the game about 20 times.

Just like other EA games, "Fight Night" has a few unlockable features to use when you create a new boxer. Things like different trunks, gloves and mouth guards are available to purchase with money you earn from fights. Among the more interesting features that you can use to create a boxer are the opportunities to select entrance music, headgear, tattoos and even girls to follow your boxer to the ring.

'Fight Night 2004'
X-Box, PS2, Game Cube
Publisher: EA Sports
Developer: EA Sports Sport

The 'create-a-boxer' option is very detailed and goes by the looks most boxers have. Despite the lack of hairstyles, you can still create a boxer that either resembles yourself, or that TA that gave you a bad grade and extract some virtual aggression. It definitely adds more to the game besides using the all-star boxers over and over again.

The game includes Lennox Lewis, Evander Holyfield, Joe Frazier, Sonny Liston and Muhammad Ali. All of these guys are listed in the game during their prime years and can help you deliver some interesting matches. The game creates each of these boxers' images in the ring very well. Muhammad still floats around the ring as Holyfield pounds away the competition.

Overall "Fight Night 2004" delivers good graphics and a very realistic gaming experience. Yet it fails to live up to the hype, as you will find yourself quickly frustrated that you can't win any matches when entering career mode. This is definitely a game for a boxing gamer or someone who doesn't mind being patient and learning how to play. "Fight Night 2004" is currently available at your local retailer.

Greenwood, Sigur Ros go to the movies

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

In the years since "OK Computer" was released in 1997 Radiohead has garnered immense critical praise for being daring and innovative. There has also, predictably, been a backlash, by people who just don't 'get it,' those who are just inclined to go against the grain of popular opinion, those who are simply bitter, and those that just aren't fans of what Radiohead's been doing. Granted, not everyone is going to agree on music; one doesn't even have to search that hard to find someone who really hates The Beatles or Nirvana, so finding that a large number of people dislike Radiohead shouldn't be a shock. These people like to pull out terms like 'self-indulgent' and 'weird just for the sake of being weird.' If so many people are so troubled by Radiohead's quirks and peculiarities then it's unimaginable what they will think of the new album from Jonny Greenwood, the band's lead guitarist and multi-instrumentalist.

Jonny Greenwood
'Bodysong: Music From the film'
Capitol

Greenwood is the first member of Radiohead to step out with a solo album, which he has constructed as the soundtrack for the film "Bodysong". The film, not yet released in the US, purports to show the entire range of human life – from birth to death, focusing on different themes and experiences of life – and Greenwood's score is equally all over the map. "Pearlree" is an ambient drone, "Splitter" is an homage to old-school jazz, and "24 Hour Charleston", which features the only guest-spot from a Radiohead member (Jonny's brother and the band's bassist Colin), has a cutup laptop drum beat that slithers along a slightly jazzy backdrop.

The disc starts off promisingly enough with "Moon Trills" which, with its' funereal piano and haunting background noises grabs attention, almost promising a buildup. There is no follow through on the promise though, the song simply fades away, and that is essentially the problem with the disc. A lot of the songs meander, if they even go anywhere, and the album feels much more suited to playing along as background then working as an isolated piece. Certainly "Bodysong" is challenging and, with so much dull, straightforward music in the world, one certainly has to respect Greenwood's effort and talent, not to mention the creativity. Unfortunately, it seems, sometimes effort, talent, and creativity simply aren't enough. Radiohead is a great band, with a myriad of stunning songs, because they are able to harness all that skill and intelligence and make music that hits the listener deeply. "Bodysong" is a testament to Greenwood's brain and his adeptness at not only his instrument, but also many different facets of music and art, yet is not gripping listening.

Sigur Ros
'Ba Ba Ti Ki Di Do'
Capitol

That isn't, to be clear, to say that the disc is 'self-indulgent,' nor is it 'weird for the sake of being weird.' The disc is unconventional, at least by the standards of pop music, even perhaps by Radiohead standards, but it does not try too hard to be different. The problem is that "Bodysong" at first appears to be a beautiful mystery, a completely different world then most Radiohead fans are used to, but in the end the exploration doesn't quite seem worth the time. "Bodysong" is not bad by any means and most Radiohead die-hards will pick it up no matter what. The disc is certainly worth a spin and can serve as a very interesting listen, or very nice background noise, but "Bodysong" is not an album most listeners will find themselves reaching for very often.

Sigur Ros, the Icelandic band that has become nothing short of a sensation, has a good amount in common with Radiohead. They are friends and peers; they both share many of the same influences and are influenced by one another; they both have gained popularity while remaining fairly left-field though Sigur Ros, being even more unconventional, has gained less.

The band, whose 2002 album "( )" was their breakthrough success, has another thing in common with Radiohead: Last year they both agreed to compose music for Merce Cunningham's ballet "Split Sides" The difference is that Sigur Ros is the only one of the two to commercially release their compositions. The piece, titled "Ba Ba Ti Ki Di Do" flows as one movement but comes separated into three tracks titled "Ba Ba", "Ti Ki", and "Di Do".

Antibalas Afrobeat come to the Valley

Brooklyn-based Antibalas Afrobeat Orchestra will bring their unique sound to Pearl Street tommorrow at 8:30 p.m.

Antibalas Afrobeat Orchestra
Tomorrow
Pearl Street
Northampton
$12.50, $15

If rhythm were royalty, Antibalas would be kings, presiding over the vast musical landscape before them. They would travel the world, assembling an army of beats beneath their empire of sound.

Unfortunately, that is not the case. It seems that pop stars are royalty these days, and the majesty of the massive groove has all but been sidelined in lieu of pretty faces and bawdy dance maneuvers.

Brooklyn's Antibalas Afrobeat Orchestra (Antibalas is Spanish for "bulletproof") will operate instead as the Robin Hood of funk: crushing the pop world one dance floor at a time, delivering hypnotic grooves to the underprivileged.

And you can pick up your share at Pearl Street, tomorrow night. In fact, you can be the first kid on your block to cash in on the ensemble's sexy horn lines, James Brown guitar licks and chunky beats.

Antibalas, a New York cooperative comprised of 11 core members, formed in 1997, the brainchild of saxophonist Martin Perna (he plays baritone in the band). Since its first gig in Harlem some six years ago, the group has appeared on record with Medeski, Martin and Wood and shared the stage with Trey Anastasio and James Brown.

But Antibalas never was any good at sharing; when they step on stage, they make that space their own. The group throws down a potent brew of dub, jazz and funk music known as afrobeat, a style pioneered by the late, great Fela Kuti (Nigeria's answer to Bob Marley). When Fela passed on in 1997, another link on the endless chain of AIDS casualties, the torch was passed. Perna and his Afrobeat Orchestra were pleased to receive.

So don't be left out in the cold tomorrow night, when that torch is lit once more at Pearl Street. When Antibalas came to visit last semester, they caused a buzz that lasted weeks. Tickets are $12.50 in advance, $15.00 at the door. The afrobeat kicks in at 8:30 p.m.

For The Penfifteen Club size doesn't matter

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

The "Hang Down EP" from the fresh California quartet The Penfifteen Club (Penfifteen would be abbreviated as PEN15; get it?) does everything a good EP should do: The disc is brief, perhaps too brief, and it rushes in with a nonstop flurry of sunny pop-rock. It pummels the listener with hooks, melodies and intelligence. It whets the appetite for the eventual full-length release.

The band, lead by Luke Tierney, the former front man of the overlooked Silverjet (whose album "Pull Me Up ... Drag Me Down" should be immediately sought out by any fans of smart indie-pop), is best known for the track "Hey Ms. Hilton" which, since being featured on Fox's Paris Hilton reality show "The Simple Life," has begun to pick up a bit of steam.

"Hang Down" proves that The Penfifteen Club is anything but a novelty act; the entire disc is radio-ready in the best of ways. "Hey Ms. Hilton" is immediately infectious, practically daring you not to sing along by the end of the song, which pays tribute to the blonde hotel heir. After just one listen you will no longer associate Paris Hilton with internet sex tapes, but with crunching guitar riffs, catchy melodies and a thumping kick drum, provided courtesy of George Pendergast, who, with bassist Misha Feldmann, make up the band's very tight rhythm section.

In an ideal world where sharp pop rock still had a place on the radio the track "Play Dead" would be a number one single, with a chorus, "If you want I'll roll over and beg / I'll play dead for you," that will resonate perfectly with anyone who's ever been devoted to a bad relationship. "Party Favor," a tale about a love-starved girl, takes a slightly darker tone while "Disco Motherfker" is definitely the most experimental track on the EP; it's certainly not the best song but with its vocal effects and dance floor ready beat, It proves the band is ready to experiment.

"The High Low-Class" is possibly the disc's best track. It's a fast-paced adrenaline rush and even though Tierney has tongue firmly in cheek when he sings "I like a car when the stereo blasts / Live like a pop star hope I don't crash" you'll be hard pressed not to roll the windows down and hit the gas. Tierney's lyrics depict him as the type of guy who equally loves Pavement and The Beach Boys, the Beatles and Sonic Youth (the name-dropped Thurston Moore in a song on Silverjet's album).

The Penfifteen Club
'Hang Down EP'
Big One Five

Of course there are a few, albeit very minor, complaints about the "Hang Down EP." While it is an EP, it is so short (clocking in at about 15 minutes) that the listener is bound to be begging for more. Sure, the point of the EP is set people up for the full-length one, but one can't help but ask for a couple more songs, although the five that are present on the disc are certainly addictive enough.

The only other real problem is availability, which isn't really something the band can control. For the time being the disc is only being sold through the Penfifteen Club's website, www.thepenfifteenclub.com; it's a slight hassle but the disc makes it well worth the trouble.

The Penfifteen Club, much like Silverjet once did, combines indie sensibilities with the catchiness and instant enjoyability of pop while still maintaining an original voice. So many bands try too hard to avoid sounding like pop music, making for strained and boring 'experimental' music, while others try far too hard to make their music accessible and radio-friendly. In a world of dumbed-down rock music, made to the ideals of a Top 40 programmer, The Penfifteen Club provides some much needed smartened-up pop-rock that is sure to be a great soundtrack to many summer nights: windows down, stereo blasting.

Billy Bob: Father to be

Thorton

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Billy Bob Thornton is going to be a father — again.

The 48-year-old actor, already celebrating this weekend's debut of his latest film, "The Alamo," announced Thursday that he and girlfriend, Connie Angland, are expecting a child this fall.

"The due date is set for sometime in October," Thornton publicist Arnold Robinson said.

Angland, 39, doesn't work in the entertainment business. There were no other details about the couple.

Thornton, who has three children from two previous marriages, divorced actress Angelina Jolie in May 2003.

Thornton plays Davy Crockett in "The Alamo," which also stars Jason Patric and Dennis Quaid. His other films include "Sling Blade" and "A Simple Plan."

The next 'X-Files'

Duchovny

LOS ANGELES (AP) — David Duchovny expects that Mulder and Scully will ride again one day.

Duchovny said a second big-screen installment of "The X-Files" remains in the works. Though he doesn't know the plot, Duchovny said "X-Files" creator Chris Carter has signed off on the story premise.

"I'm dying to hear it," the 43-year-old actor told The Associated Press in an interview for his new movie "Connie and Carla," starring Nia Vardalos and Toni Collette, which opens April 16. "So now it's just a matter of making sure everybody can get together at the same time and do it."

Duchovny starred as alien-hunting FBI agent Mulder for seven full seasons of "The X-Files," worked part-time for an eighth season and returned for the series finale at the end of season nine.

He and co-star Gillian Anderson, who played Mulder's skeptical partner, Scully, also starred in the 1998 movie version of "The X-Files."

"I'm at the point where I finally miss it," Duchovny said. "I wanted the grind to end, but I never wanted the show just to end. And I'd always had this fantasy and hope that it would be a movie franchise. Hopefully, this second movie will give it a foundation as such."

A royal lawsuit

Prince

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) — A college student has sued Prince and his bodyguard for allegedly assaulting him after he took a picture of the rock star getting off a flight at Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport.

Anthony Fitzgerald of Edina filed the lawsuit Wednesday in Hennepin County District Court.

It states that Prince's bodyguard, identified only as "Trevor," lunged at Fitzgerald on Dec. 29 "in an aggressive, threatening manner," then grabbed his digital camera, leaving him "stunned and humiliated."

The lawsuit alleges assault and battery, loss of the camera and intentional infliction of emotional distress that left Fitzgerald anxious and unable to sleep.

Edina attorney Frank Berman said the lawsuit, dated Jan. 14, was filed Wednesday because Prince's "people" wouldn't accept a copy of it. Fitzgerald is asking the court for instructions on how to serve him with it.

Ronnie Lippin, a Prince spokeswoman, told the Star-Tribune she wasn't familiar with the lawsuit.

Tenn. has Dolly's support

NASHVILLE, Tenn. (AP) — Dolly Parton and Isaac Hayes will appear in a new series of state tourism ads that beckon visitors with the slogan: "Tennessee, the stage is set for you!"

Gov. Phil Bredesen announced the television, radio and print campaign Wednesday during a luncheon for tourism industry professionals.

Parton, who built the Dollywood theme park near her mountain hometown of Sevierville, invites tourists to make Tennessee their stage for family fun, thrills, relaxation, celebration, discovery and romance.

"Just remember Tennessee is great for more than music. The stage is set for you, honey, come play on it," she says during an ad previewed to members of the Tennessee Tourism Roundtable.

"I'm doing this because I love Tennessee — I'm a Tennessee girl," Parton said in a video introducing the campaign. "I mean, there's nothing we can't do in Tennessee. The stage is set for everything."

Singer-songwriter Hayes, a Memphis native who serves as the voice of Chef on "South Park," filmed the second ad Monday at the Stax Museum of American Soul Music.

Books by Beckham

Beckham

LONDON (AP) — A book about punctuation, an unlikely best seller in any year, won the top prize Wednesday at the British Book Awards ceremonies.

"Eats, Shoots & Leaves," a lighthearted look at the pitfalls of apostrophes and rampant commas, won the book of the year award for author Lynne Truss.

Alexander McCall Smith, author of a series of popular books about the "No. 1 Ladies' Detective Agency," was named author of the year.

The British Book Awards are nominated and judged by a panel of 400 publishers, wholesalers and booksellers, together with a telephone vote from the public. The awards usually reflect popular public taste rather than critics' views.

"The Curious Incident of the Dog in the Night-Time" picked up more awards for author Mark Haddon — children's book of the year and the literary fiction award. The book already had won the Whitbread award.

Monica Ali won newcomer of the year for her debut novel, "Brick Lane."

Soccer megastar David Beckham won a special prize for the scale of success of his ghostwritten autobiography, "My Side." The book sold 103,000 copies in its first week and has sold more than 1 million copies so far.

Indie rockers enter uncharted territory

while gliding along. This track leads directly into "Ti Ki" which maintains the dreamlike quality but quickly starts to wear a little thin. "Ti Ki" and, to a lesser extent, "Ba Ba" lack the power and emotion that Sigur Ros is usually able to convey. The set really proves its worth in the stunning climax "Di Do". The track features the only vocals of the set, a cut up, unidentifiable and undistinguishable sample. Behind it a haunting bee noise set to disturb the lull the listener is probably in. The entire track builds and the vocals get louder and louder, becoming a rhythmical instrument. Shortly thereafter, the entire track devolves into wreckage; squeaks and feedback are everywhere and it seems like the entire world is crashing down. "Ba Ba" and "Ti Ki" set a mood and "Di Do" rushes into the scene and completely destroys it, leaving nothing but debris around the listener's ear. This is the power of Sigur Ros.

"Ba Ba..." does not reach the heights of "( )" or the band's 2001 album "Agaetis Byrjun", but perhaps it's not supposed to. The piece is certainly a very nice addition to someone's Sigur Ros collection but most fans will not find themselves listening to it nearly as often as the band's full-lengths. Newcomers would be better off getting "( )" or "Agaetis Byrjun" then jumping straight into "Ba Ba ... ," which is still very good but doesn't reach the peaks that Sigur Ros normally ascends to.

Guns become a 'peace' of Cambodian Art

By Miranda Leitsinger
Associated Press

PHNOM PENH, Cambodia (AP) — The sparks are flying and the metal cutting machines whirring in a workshop where rusty guns lie strewn on the floor. Around the sculptors — who cut, bang and bend the battered AK-47 and M-16 assault rifles — stand life-size horses, birds, an elephant and crabs, as well as a functioning bicycle: works of art they've crafted from the remnants of 30 years of conflict that wreaked havoc on Cambodia.

At the Peace of Art Project Cambodia studio, 23 university art students are learning how to transform weapons of war into messages of peace.

"To help promote a weapon-free society is one of the main aims, just to try and get it into the Cambodian mentality that actually guns aren't the answer to everything. And this is a way," says Sasha Constable, a British artist who runs the project.

In Cambodia, civilians own 500,000 to 1 million handguns and military rifles — contributing to widespread public fear, according to a report issued last fall by the human rights groups Amnesty International and Oxfam.

Many of the arms are left over from the Vietnam War and three decades of civil war, which also left behind unexploded bombs, land mines and other ordnance. In the mid-1970s, Cambodians suffered from the Khmer Rouge regime, one of the most brutal in modern times.

Since the government started collecting weapons from Cambodians in 1999, it has destroyed about 120,000 either by crushing or burning.

The sculptors obtained nearly 900 destroyed guns from the government, and a British mine removal group also donated weapons and spent ammunition. The work isn't easy. Some students say the guns' hardened metal is not easy to forge or weld into a sculpture, or cut into a desired shape.

Rust-covered guns have been peeled apart to get at smaller pieces — triggers used as hand brakes for a bicycle, rifle barrels for animal legs.

The students also plan to try their hand at turning guns into furniture.

"Although the weapons haven't lost their significance ... it has just become a material for making a beautiful object," says Constable, a descendant of John Constable, the 19th century English landscape painter.

For some students, the guns are meant to retain their meaning.

One of Toun Thorneakea's sculptures depicts a woman who has lost a leg to conflict and is holding a child. A rifle balanced on her shoulder symbolizes the burden of weapons on humankind, the 24-year-old artist says.

"When I was young, I hated guns a lot because I experienced a lot of people getting killed in the violence, especially war," he says. "That is why I want to turn all the weapons in this workshop into sculptures to contribute to the awareness of peace."

Sophon Samkhan's praying mantis, a towering work made from about 50 guns that stands about 7 feet high and is more than 7 feet long, shows the insect breaking a gun in half.

"Before, I wanted to make a sculpture of a man holding a gun and breaking it. Later on, I thought that it's not only people that don't like war ... animals don't either," he says.

The project is not the first of its kind. Artists have crafted sculptures out of weapons from Mozambique and two Canadian artists created a sculpture made of more than 7,000 guns and cartridges donated by police and armies worldwide.

The Cambodian project, which began in November, has about $55,000 in funding from the European Union's weapons collection program, actresses Angelina Jolie and Emma Thompson, and Australia's Griffith University.

Constable brought in local engineering technicians, British sculptor Joe Rush and Idaho blacksmith Mark Solomon to help teach the students how to use a forge, work with tools, weld and shape metal.

"Basically they were starting from scratch with no experience at all, which is why it's so impressive," Constable says. "It's incredible, really, how quickly they've picked up the techniques and how complex their structures are so quickly."

The group has had two exhibits in Phnom Penh and is planning one at Griffith University. It also hopes to take the sculptures to even more countries.

Crew prepares for Brown after strong start to begin the season

By Dan Duggan
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's rowing team will take to the waters on Saturday for a showdown with the Brown Bears and the Rutgers Scarlet Knights. The Brown Invite will be held on the Seekonk River in Providence, R.I. starting at 10:45 a.m.

The Minutewomen are looking to build off of a successful beginning to their 2004 campaign. Last Saturday, UMass captured the gold medal in the Yankee Cup, featuring the University of New Hampshire and the University of Rhode Island.

New Hampshire, a team considered to be a contender for the Atlantic 10 title, finished a distant third. The first varsity eight and the second varsity eight swept the competition, sending a message to A-10 schools that UMass will be difficult to dethrone as defending A-10 champions.

UMass gained more momentum by winning two of four races, and the overall victory the next day against Holy Cross and Columbia. The varsity eight collected its second win of the weekend and the novice eight also took home a win. The varsity eight win was the key to the victory as more overall points were given to the team with the superior varsity eight.

In this weekend's competition, UMass will encounter some tough competition in Brown, who is ranked fourth in the country in this week's Collegiate Rowing Coaches Association poll.

The Minutewomen just missed the top 20, but they did garner one vote and another strong showing this weekend could certainly improve their status.

Saturday will be the best conditions the team has seen all year, as the forecast calls for clear skies and temperatures in the mid-40s.

The race, initially scheduled to start at 10:30 a.m., will now start at 10:45 a.m. with the second novice eight leading off. The novice eight is slated for 11:00, followed by the varsity four at 11:30, the second varsity eight at 12:00, and finally the varsity eight at 12:30 p.m.

the leadoff spot, where he homered and scored a pair of runs in four at bats on Tuesday. The move also bumped senior captain Mike Athas down to the two-hole, where he picked up a hit and a run as well.

"We're moving guys around, just trying to find the right mix," Stone said. "Losing Cullan forced us to make more changes, but were hoping to have a pretty set lineup at some point."

Dayton, meanwhile, enters play at 12-16 overall and 2-4 in the A-10, and is coming off a 7-6 non-conference loss to Miami-Ohio on Wednesday.

The Flyers were swept by Fordham in their first A-10 series of the season, but rebounded to take two-of-three from St. Joe's the following weekend.

Senior outfielder Patrick Flynn leads the offensive charge with a .415 batting average, four homeruns and 28 runs batted in, while junior classmates Brandon Godzik and Nick Bohnenstiehl are hitting .373 and .357, respectively.

Six-foot-six junior Jerry Blevins is the staff ace, having compiled a 4-1 record and a 4.00 earned run average in six starts. Craig Stammen anchors the bullpen with four saves, but has struggled mightily on the season as evident by his 0-3 record and 5.56 ERA.

batting average from last season by an impressive .101 this season.

Other veterans such as junior Pam Sulick and sophomore Kristen Stefanoni have been waiting for their chance to shine in the starting line-up. Stefanoni has added quickness on the base paths and a .951 fielding percentage at second. Sulick had hit a pair of homeruns this season and has shown signs on added power in swing at practice.

"Our kids work hard on fundamentals and really have bought into the team system," Sortino said.

Minutemen face Manhattan

MEN'S LAX from page 8

"I don't think that's going to be too much of a problem [to renew]," he said.

Last year, Zywicki was the Minutemen's leading scorer, with 41 goals and 21 assists, and was expected to lead the UMass attack this year.

"It was pretty disappointing, coming in excited to play and have a good season, so I think it'd be awesome to get that whole year back.

"Right now I'm on track to graduate in May, but I guess I can withdraw from a class and then do it next spring. I'm not sure about that kind of stuff. There's a whole lot of options. There's grad school, if I don't finish my degree, I can come back as an undergrad with senior billing. I could take another major or minor, so there's a whole bunch of options that I'm looking at."

This season, the Minutemen are 6-4, and after a start that alternated between solid — witness the 15-7 win over Hartford and the 10-3 win at Stony Brook — and mediocre — losses to North Carolina, Brown, and Albany — they have put together a three-game win streak that includes Saturday's impressive 17-8 thumping of Penn State. After watching his team struggle, particularly on offense — the Minutemen averaged one goal every 4.8 shots in their first six games, compared with one goal every 2.9 shots taken in their last three games — Zywicki is excited about the newfound explosiveness in the attack

"The last two games we played real well, especially the Penn State game. It's really exciting to see the team working together like that finally," Canella said.

The Minutemen (5-4, 1-0 ECAC) look to continue their winning streak tonight against Manhattan, who they'll square off against in a rare 7 p.m. start under the lights at Garber Field. It's the first UMass night game since 1999.

"It might be a big deal to people, that we're playing under the lights, but we do it all the time," said Cannella, who often leads practices after dark at Garber Field.

Minutewomen look to turn season around against A-10

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Correspondent

You can throw every cliché in the book at the UMass Minutewomen lacrosse team.

It's not how you start; it's how you finish. They have a clean slate. It's a brand new season.

After dropping six games in a row in their out of conference schedule, the Minutewomen (2-6, 1-0 A-10) opened up their Atlantic 10 season on Sunday with an impressive 12-11 victory over Duquesne who came in riding high from its six-game winning streak.

UMass proved that it was able to win a close game after losing four by a total of five goals already this season. They are now 1-3 in games decided by one goal during their 2004 campaign.

Junior Kristin St. Hilaire had another outstanding defensive performance by shutting down Ginger Flocco, one of the premier scorers in the A-10. She also caused three turnovers and picked up three ground balls.

Sophomore midfielder Kerri Connerty scored three goals in the win over the Dukes, and, as a result, she was named A-10 Performer of the Week on Monday.

The Minutewomen will carry all of this momentum into their weekend road trip beginning today at Richmond (5-5, 1-1 A-10) at 3 p.m.

The Spiders are coming off a 9-7 win over American University on Tuesday, and they are 3-1 on their home turf at Lacrosse Field this season while UMass is only 1-3 away from Garber Field.

Senior attacker Polly Purcell is Richmond's all-time leader in assists, and she is currently third in the A-10 in goals per game with 2.4 per contest.

Purcell and senior Libby Berlacher are ranked first and second in the A-10 in ground balls with 41 and 30 respectively.

It is possible that the Richmond women may not have their heads in the game against UMass, as they are hosting Duke, the fourth-ranked team in the nation, on Sunday. Interestingly enough, this is the third time this season that Richmond has played two games in a three day stretch, and they have lost the first game before winning the latter each of the first two times.

The Spiders defeated three straight top-20 teams in early March but have lost three of five games since.

UMass will cap off its weekend road trip in the nation's capital on Sunday at noon when they take on George Washington University (5-5, 1-0).

The Colonials are victors in three straight and have won five of their last seven games since their 0-3 start to the season.

Freshman Laura Hostetler was named the Atlantic 10 Conference Rookie of the Week on Monday following a three-goal performance, including the game winner, against Richmond on April 2. This was the fourth time she has been honored this season with that award.

Hostetler, the niece of former NFL quarterback Jeff Hostetler, netted three more goals in George Washington's win over Division II opponent Longwood University on Tuesday.

The Minutewomen have a chance to improve their conference record to 3-0 this weekend, which would give them a great shot to grab one of the four A-10 tournament seeds.

UMass offense this season hasn't been as balanced as desirable, so they will need a strong weekend by their top scorers.

Tracey Drown leads the team in points with 28 and assists with 11. She has also tallied the second most goals on the team with 17.

Hope Zellinger leads the team in goals scored with 23 and is second in overall points with 26.

Connerty and Maura McGarrity are tied for third with 12 goals each, and Connerty is second on the Minutewomen with 4 assists. Throw every cliché in the book at the Minutewomen lacrosse team, but after ending their six-game skid, they can come back with one of their own.

They're down, but not out.

Senior Hope Zelinger has 23 goals and three assists this season for the Minutemen. Zelinger and UMass travel to Richmond today to take on the Spiders for a 3 p.m. face-off.

Zywicki seeks medical waiver

UMass loses all star for rest of season

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

Pending the tying up of a few loose knots, the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team will officially be without last season's top scorer for the rest of the year.

Senior attackman Jeff Zywicki is making arrangements to receive a medical hardship waiver for the 2004 season. Zywicki, who has not played since the Minutemen's 12-7 loss to North Carolina in which he scored a goal, made the decision after finding himself unable to play against Hofstra on March 28.

"I figured if [the injury is] not ready yet, and won't be for a couple of weeks ... is there any point in coming back for three, maybe four games the rest of the season?" Zywicki said. "I really hadn't considered it before then ... when I realized I wouldn't play more than three or four games."

In NCAA parlance, Zywicki "may be granted an additional year of competition by the conference or the Academics/Eligibility/Compliance Cabinet for reasons of 'hardship.'"

A hardship is defined as the inability to compete because of injury or illness, as long as the injury occurred before the halfway point of the season, and the athlete has not played in more than 20 percent of his or her team's contests.

Zywicki suffered a back injury prior to the season that kept him out of many of the team's preseason practices, and was only worsened by Zywicki's participation against North Carolina on Feb. 28 in Baltimore. The injury was enough to hobble the senior from Nepean, Ontario, who was often seen in pregame warm-ups this season walking around without making any game-related moves.

"It just came to a point where he's not able to practice," UMass coach Greg Cannella said, "so I said, 'Jeff, what do you want to do? Do you want to come back and play six games this year, or play 14 next year? And these six games, you're not guaranteed to play because you're not in shape.'

"I think with that in his head, he decided to get healthy this year, and then come back next year hopefully strong."

There were some questions about Zywicki's ability to stay in the United States for another year. A Canadian citizen, Zywicki's visa runs out this year, as it was designed for a four-year college program.

Senior attackman Jeff Zywicki will attempt to obtain a medical hardship waiver, allowing him to retain a year of eligibility. Zywicki scored 41 goals and 21 assists last year, and scored one goal in the Minutemen's game against North Carolina on Feb. 28, his only appearance of the season.

After four national tournaments against the best in the nation, the Massachusetts softball team came out with a Blue & Gold tournament title in Miami and a respectable 9-11 record.

Riding a nine game winning streak, the Minutewomen (16-11, 2-0 Atlantic 10) now have a bulls-eye on their backs entering A-10 schedule as they are favored to win their 10th straight A-10 title. The Minutewomen will host Dayton at UMass softball complex in a doubleheader slated to start at 1:30 p.m.

"I think opponents view us as a program to reckon with, because they know our history," head coach Elaine Sortino said. "We have such high standards that we feel there is a bulls-eye on your stomach, toes, heels, everywhere. I think the pressure makes us raise the bar and we liked being chased. That just keeps us pushing ourselves to get better."

UMass will host its second home game of the season since defeating Vermont, 6-0, on March 26. The Minutewomen have won 59 straight games at the UMass Softball Complex, the longest home winning streak in the nation. Their last home lost was on April 30, 2000 in a 3-1 defeat against Dayton in first game of a doubleheader.

A victory in the second game started the 59-game streak. Since the park open in 2000, the Maroon and White have complied a 71-3 home record.

On top of dominating at home, UMass has been the best team in the A-10 for over a decade. It has won 13 out of the last 16 regular season titles and has nine straight A-10 Tournament titles. Amassing a 65-1 record in the last 66 A-10 games, Sortino feels the home field does not provide an advantage in conference play.

"The home field advantage doesn't matter," Sortino said. "Home is comfortable, but the only difference is more people are there for us. That's why I feel it's exactly harder to play at home, because expectation level is so high."

Sortino has called this team "one of her deepest and best hitting team she ever had." The depth part has been proved as a couple freshmen and veterans have filled the void for five departed A-10 selections.

Freshmen Amanda Morin and Candace Molinari have filled the void in left field and first baseman this season. Morin had a big role to fill in replacing former All-American Brandi Cross, who set the home run record at 11 roundtrippers. The 5-foot-11 freshman can't be expect to put the record breaking numbers, but has provided a solid bat. Sporting a .275 batting average, Morin had six hits during a doubleheader against Harvard Tuesday.

Molinari was only the .300 hitter in Maroon and White during the early part of season, thought she now joined by sophomore K.J. Kelley (.306 BA), senior Aisha Franke (.307 BA) and junior Hilary Puglia (.316 BA). The former A-10 Rookie of the Week still leads the team in batting average (.318) and is yet to make an error in left field.

Puglia has made her own strides this season. Known for a good fielding presence, the Stoneham native has been solid at shortstop since replacing departed All-American Emily Robustelli. Puglia has also boosted her .215

Baseball takes on Flyers for second A-10 series of season

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Having finally played its 2004 home opener after two weeks worth of washouts, the Massachusetts baseball team returns to the road this weekend when it will head to Ohio to face Atlantic 10 rival Dayton in a three-game series.

The Minutemen will be looking to climb back to .500 in conference play after dropping two-of-three at George Washington in their only other conference series of the season, and are well-rested after playing only twice in the past two weeks.

However with nine of his team's next 10 games away from Earl Lorden Field's temperamental weather, including an A-10 series at St. Joseph's next weekend in addition to this weekend's set with the Flyers, head coach Mike Stone knows that the pace will begin to pick up as the stretch drive approaches.

"It certainly doesn't help to be rained out as much as we have and only play two games in two weeks," the veteran coach said. "We used nine pitchers [in Tuesday's win over Holy Cross] simply because guys hadn't gotten work.

"Now that we're getting away from New England and the weather starts to get nicer, our guys workload is going to increase and we need to be ready for that and remain competitive."

The time off certainly has not helped UMass' pitching staff, as sophomore right-hander Matt Torra surrendered two hits and three runs in an inning of work against the Crusaders, while fellow starter Mike Crane coughed up a pair of hits and was victimized by a pair of wild pitches in his only frame.

Crane wasn't the only Maroon and White hurler bitten by wildness, as junior closer Scott Ratliff managed to record two outs but walked the bases loaded in the top of the ninth before being removed in favor of freshman Devin Barnett.

Stone will take the bad with the good, however, as right-handers Anthony Gallo and David Sullivan and southpaw Keith Doherty each posted a scoreless inning on Tuesday, while senior ace Eric Chown worked a pair of scoreless frames, striking out two.

"We want to get all of our guys on the same page," Stone said. "We had mixed results [against Holy Cross], and we want all of our guys throwing well as we get into the bulk of our schedule.

"That's something that will come with facing live hitters, and there will be plenty of opportunities to see where our guys are at over the weekend and the next few weeks."

On the offensive side, Stone continues to tweak his lineup in search of the right combination – a task made more difficult after senior second baseman Cullan Maumus went down with a broken arm after being hit by a pitch.

One experiment that did work out was moving junior rightfielder Jason Twomley into Junior pitcher Eric Chown is currently 2-2 this season for the Minutemen and leads the team in innings pitched with 29.1. UMass travels to Dayton tomorrow to play a three-game series against the Flyers.

Bush: Federal agents on top of terror

Release of memo may cast doubt on confidence of administration

By Pete Yost
Associated Press

CRAWFORD, Texas (AP) — For two years, national security adviser Condoleezza Rice left Americans with the impression that President Bush's pre-Sept. 11 terrorism briefing focused on historical information dating to 1998 and that any current threats mostly involved overseas targets.

Yet the release, under public pressure, of the president's briefing memo from Aug. 6, 2001, showed that Bush had received intelligence reporting as recent as May 2001 and that most of the current information focused on possible plots in the United States.

Bush insisted yesterday he was satisfied that federal agents were on top of the terrorist threat when he read that memo, which detailed Osama bin Laden's intentions on U.S. soil.

"I was satisfied that some of the matters were being looked into" and had any specific intelligence pointed to threats of attacks on New York and Washington, "I would have moved mountains" to prevent it, Bush said during a visit to Fort Hood in Texas.

But he said the document, which the White House released Saturday night, contained "nothing about an attack on America. It talked about intentions, about somebody who hated America — well, we knew that."

Should the memo — a leading topic of the Sunday talk shows — have raised "more of an alarm bell than it did? I think in hindsight that's probably true," said Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz. He said the Clinton and Bush administrations bear responsibility for Sept. 11.

The existence of the president's briefing memo was disclosed to the public at a news conference in May 2002. The "overwhelming bulk of the evidence" before Sept. 11, Rice declared, was that any terrorist attack "was likely to take place overseas."

Most of the CIA reporting during the summer of 2001 did focus on possible overseas targets. But the memo specifically told Bush that al-Qaida had reached American shores, had a support system in place and was engaging in "patterns of suspicious activity ... consistent with preparations for hijackings or other types of attacks."

In May 2002, Rice said, "There was specific threat reporting about al-Qaida attacks against U.S. targets." She did not mention that it was in the report sent to the president.

To accentuate the potential domestic threat, the memo told Bush the FBI had 70 investigations related to bin Laden under way.

The president's memo mentioned two current threats: suspected al-Qaida operatives might have cased federal buildings in New York and that, according to a phone call to an American embassy in the Middle East, a group of bin Laden supporters was in the United States to plan attacks with explosives. The FBI later concluded the two Yemeni men photographing buildings in New York were tourists.

Slade Gorton, a member of the commission investigating the Sept. 11 attacks, said the memo "did talk about potential attacks in the United States," but "it didn't give the slightest clue as to what they would be or where they would be."

"The FBI has more questions to answer than Condoleezza Rice or (former presidential anti-terrorism adviser) Dick Clarke or anyone we've had testify before us so far," said Gorton, a former Republican senator from Washington state.

Gorton said the reference in the memo sent to the president about 70 FBI investigations "would be sort of comforting to the person who read it the first time around."

Commissioner Richard Ben-Veniste, a Democrat, saw as significant the memo's references to May 2001 intelligence about a possible al-Qaida explosives plot inside the United States.

President George W. Bush

The "leadership at the top," said Ben-Veniste, should have "butted heads together, get them in the same room, and then pulse the agencies: 'What do you know?' Get all of your agents out there with messages to say, 'Tell us everything you know at this moment.'"

But Richard Perle, a former Pentagon adviser who was an assistant defense secretary in the Reagan administration, said there was "not enough specificity to take any action."

"What could a president have done under those circumstances? Shut down the United States? Grounded all air-

Math contest winners take home prizes

By Michelle Rivera
Collegian Staff

The winners and honorable mentions of the 19th Annual Mathematics Competition at the University of Massachusetts have been announced.

Taking first place along with a generous $1,600 cash prize is sophomore Elena Zaurova, mathematics major.

Following in second place with $1000 in cash is freshman Kevin S. Grimaldi, computer science major.

Taking third place with a $400 cash prize is sophomore Edward J. Slavich, physics major.

The three honorable mentions winning a $100 cash prize are freshman Thomas W. Folz-Donahue, mathematics major, sophomore Vitaliy B. Lvin, computer science major, and sophomore Michael A. Sindelar, computer science major.

Slavich, who placed second in the competition last year, said his money would be used to pay back his father for his tuition.

"He's waiting for me with his pocket open," joked Slavich.

Folz-Donahue said he put his money right into his bank account and that the prize was certainly deserved; only two of the contestants finished the two-hour exam before the time was up.

Slavich agreed.

"It was really difficult," he said. "I had a small hope of winning even though I came in second last year."

The Annual Mathematics Competition started in 1986 and is open to all freshmen and sophomore students who attend UMass Amherst, with exception to continuing education students and first-prize winners of preceding years.

The competition took place on March 31 from 7:15 p.m. to 9:15 p.m. in rooms 101 and 103 in the Lederle Graduate Research Towers.

Problems included on the two-hour test covered pre-calculus and calculus, allowing freshmen to compete on the same level as sophomores.

In 1993, three of the five students who were awarded prizes were freshmen.

In 2002, first, second and third place awards were won by students in programs other than mathematics.

Forty-two freshmen and sophomores competed in this year's competition.

There will be a dinner and an awards ceremony on April 27 for the winners and honorable mentions, their parents, corporate sponsors, individual donors and some faculty members.

The corporate sponsors of the competition were Microsoft Research, Nukove Scientific Consulting, Solutions By Computer and State Street Global Advisors.

Pope delivers holiday words of peace

By Nicole Winfield
Associated Press

VATICAN CITY (AP) — Pope John Paul II celebrated Easter Mass on Sunday with calls for world leaders to resolve conflicts in Iraq, the Holy Land and Africa, as Christians around the world marked the holiest day on the church calendar.

John Paul delivered a message of peace on the flower-decked steps of St. Peter's Basilica, praying that hope would conquer the "inhuman" phenomenon of terrorism and urging Christians, Muslims and Jews to seek greater unity with each other.

"May the culture of life and love render vain the logic of death," he told tens of thousands of the faithful and tourists gathered in St. Peter's under tight security on an overcast day.

The 83-year-old pope delivered the message in his traditional "Urbi et Orbi" Easter address, Latin for "To the City and the World." He spoke clearly and strongly despite a grueling schedule of Holy Week ceremonies in recent days.

Easter marks the day, according to the Bible, that Jesus rose from the dead after being crucified.

The joyous celebrations in Rome contrasted with the muted Easter festivities in Jerusalem, where a few hundred pilgrims and Palestinian Christians attended Mass at the Church of the Holy Sepulcher — built over the skull-shaped rocky mount believed to be the place where Jesus was crucified.

Attendance was also low at the Virgin Mary Catholic Church in Baghdad, where about 100 Chaldean Catholics celebrated Mass.

In Moscow, the head of the Russian Orthodox Church, Patriarch Alexy II, prayed for the victims of a Siberian methane blast that killed at least 40 coal miners.

And in London, Archbishop of Canterbury Rowan Williams — spiritual leader of the worldwide Anglican Communion whose members also celebrated Easter on Sunday — said the world must not forget those who die in often-ignored places like Africa.

Easter was festive in Greece, where Orthodox Christians set fireworks and flares at churches across the country.

This year, the holiday falls on the same day in the Roman Catholic and Orthodox calendars — a coincidence John Paul mentioned when he expressed hope for more unity between the churches that have been split for 1,000 years.

"I pray to the risen Lord that all of us baptized may soon be able to together relive this fundamental feast of our faith each year on the same day," he said.

The head of the Romanian Orthodox Church, Patriarch Teoctist, echoed his call, saying there couldn't be "a more divine gift than the one that we celebrate Easter at the same time."

Mine explosion in Siberia kills 42

Miners look on at the end of their workday from inside of the Osinnikovskaya mine, neighboring the Taizhina mine ripped by a methane blast, in the town Osinniki in the Kemerovo region of western Siberia yesterday.

Disaster deemed worst for coal industry in region since 1997

By Steve Gutterman
Associated Press

OSINNIKI, Russia (AP) — The coal-blackened faces of exhausted rescuers and the red-rimmed eyes of anxious relatives told a grim story of disappearing hope yesterday, one day after a methane blast tore through a Siberian mine, killing at least 42 miners.

Five miners remained missing in the latest disaster to strike Russia's hard-scrabble coal country. "Most likely, they will all be corpses," said the head of a commission dealing with the disaster.

The blast occurred early Saturday about 1,840 feet down in the Taizhina mine in a coal-rich strip of western Siberia called the Kuzbass.

On Sunday, emergency officials plotted rescue and recovery strategies at one end of the mine's Soviet-era administration building, which is topped by a red star, while grieving relatives sat or milled nervously in a run-down auditorium dominated by a painting of a strong, smiling miner carrying flowers.

"They told me to wait," said Tatyana Fatykhova, 34, whose husband, Rashid, was underground when the blast occurred.

"They've pulled up some bodies, but they haven't identified them yet."

Her husband's name was not on the list of identified victims posted by the stairwell.

The head of a government commission created to deal with the disaster, Sergei Ovanesyan, said it was "practically impossible" that any of those still missing would be found alive.

"Most likely, they will all be corpses," he said.

Of the 42 bodies found, 36 had been retrieved and 29 of those had been identified, said officials overseeing the recovery effort.

More than 600 miners work at the mine in the city of Osinniki, according to ITAR-Tass. Taizhina opened in 1998 but was built on the foundation of a closed mine, and the equipment shown on Russian television stations appeared to be run-down.

Rescue workers dug underground toward the blast site from two sides — Taizhina and an adjacent mine in Osinniki, a sprawling community of ramshackle homes and crumbling, derelict buildings set amid barren hills streaked with snow.

A handful of rescue workers discarded oxygen tanks and lit up cigarettes after a shift underground.

Asked if there was hope of finding anyone alive, one of the rescuers shook his head to mean "no." The men refused to talk about the conditions underground, but the Interfax news agency said the area was filled with carbon dioxide and Ekho Moskvy radio said work was hampered by heavy smoke.

Deputy Prosecutor General Valentin Simuchenkov said the blast occurred after the concentration of methane gas in the mine increased by roughly 10-fold in a short period of time.

Investigators will try to determine what made the methane level increase so quickly and what triggered the blast, Simuchenkov said, adding that an earthquake or the shifting of coal plates were among the potential causes of the buildup.

A criminal investigation was opened into suspicions of safety violations, he said.

Accidents are common in the Russian coal industry, but Saturday's disaster was the deadliest in the Kuzbass since 1997, when a methane blast at a mine in nearby Novokuznetsk killed 67 people.

At Taizhina, about 1,850 miles east of Moscow, one miner was killed in September 2002 when the roof of a ventilation shaft collapsed.

Golden Key ceremony set for today

The Golden Key International Honour Society will recognize high-achieving University of Massachusetts sophomores at 7 p.m. today in the Campus Center Auditorium.

The annual Sophomore Recognition Night will feature a video presentation on the history of Golden Key, a talk by UMass professor Dr. Richard Halgin and a certificate awarding ceremony. There will also be refreshments, as well as entertainment by an ensemble of jazz music graduate students organized by Jim Carroll.

The purpose of Sophomore Recognition Night is threefold, said junior Julie T. Weismantel, a psychology major and president of Golden Key's UMass chapter.

"We want to celebrate the achievements of sophomores," said Weismantel, "As well as introduce them to Golden Key, which many of them will be invited to join next semester, and introduce them to the current members and officers."

Golden Key chose Halgin, psychology professor and clinical psychologist, to address this year's honorees. Halgin, who has taught approximately 10,000 undergraduates at UMass, will speak on "Making the Most of Your College Years."

Weismantel, along with Golden Key vice president Christina Jeon, secretary Katie Babich and treasurer George Durrance, sent event invitations to the approximately 500 sophomores who have cumulative grade point averages of 3.5 or higher. Organizing an event of such magnitude would not be possible without sup-

Pilgrims and tourists react as Pope John Paul II kisses a baby handed to him in St. Peter's Square on his open popemobile, after celebrating Easter Mass at the Vatican yesterday.

In Istanbul, the spiritual leader of the world's Orthodox Christians, Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew I, said in his Easter message that the holiday was an occasion for hope despite religious fanaticism and the killing of innocent people in conflicts and war.

In his blessing, John Paul called for all the children of Abraham — the Biblical patriarch considered the father of Christianity, Islam and Judaism — to "rediscover the brotherhood that they share and that prompts in them designs of cooperation and peace."

The pope was alert and spoke clearly throughout the Mass, though he struggled through a three-hour Easter Vigil a few hours before. John Paul, who suffers from Parkinson's disease, endured chilly night air Friday to preside over a reenactment of Christ's Passion at the Colosseum.

On Sunday, he laughed heartily when a toddler in Asian traditional dress struggled up the basilica steps to present offerings to him, and he drew cheers and applause when he delivered his annual Easter greetings in 62 languages.

port from the UMass administration and last year's Golden Key officers, said the current officers.

"The Dean of Students Office, and our advisor Gladys Rodriguez, who is the Associate Dean of Students, are indispensable to the success of our chapter," said Weismantel.

"Our senior officers helped to make our transition into office smooth and successful," said Babich. "Our thanks go out to Laura LaPlume, Wellesley Marsh, Terence Martin, Amanda Rabbit, and Tammy Wong."

Golden Key invites membership to junior and senior students in the top 15 percent of their respective classes each fall. Golden Key members represent a cross section of UMass students, since invitations are extended to both full- and part-time students from all majors.

"Golden Key provides students with leadership experience and encourages service within the University community as well as the community at large," said Weismantel. "It is not merely an academic society, but a society based upon service."

Upcoming activities include assisting with Habitat for Humanity in Greenfield, visiting residents at Hadley's Sunbridge Nursing Home, and cleaning up Elm Park in Worcester.

craft? Gone into a panic mode?"

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, said it is easy to "go back now and pick out a clue here and a tidbit there ... but we have to keep in mind the environment. We have to keep in mind the volume of reporting that the president and his advisers are dealing with each and every day."

To Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla., however, the memo should have created a sense of urgency at the top levels of government.

"If you are having a brief that is entitled 'Bin Laden Determined to Strike in the U.S.' and then it lays out specific things ... you would think that that would raise enough caution flags that you would haul in the FBI, that you'd put out an all-points bulletin," he said.

Exercise science talk today

Exercise science professor Patty S. Freedson will deliver the fourth and final Distinguished Faculty Lecture of the year at 4 p.m. today in the Massachusetts Room of the Mullins Center.

Freedson will speak on the topic of "When It Comes to Exercise, How Much is Enough?"

Freedson will address the question of necessity of people to heavily exert themselves to experience the benefits of exercise. The talk will be based on her research.

Following her lecture, Freedson will receive the Chancellor's Medal, which is the highest honor given by the University of Massachusetts Chancellor. The Distinguished Faculty Lecture Series honors individuals who have made exemplary contributions to the UMass community.

Freedson, who has been a UMass faculty member since 1981, is the director of the graduate program in exercise science. She earned her graduate and undergraduate degrees at the University of Michigan.

Freedson's areas of specialization include exercise physiology, the assessment of fitness and physical activity, and physical activity and health in selected populations.

This year, Freedson initiated a seminar series, "Success in Science, Family and Community," within the graduate program. This series gave students an opportunity to hear from highly esteemed scientists from universities around the country on their multi-faceted approaches to research.

Freedson was named a 2001-2002 TeachNology fellow by the UMass Center for Teaching. She is the second faculty member in the department of exercise science to give a Distinguished Faculty Lecture since the program's inception; Dr. Priscilla Clarkson was honored in 1998.

EDITORIAL OPINION

New insurance plan must be reconsidered

In the United States, getting your driver's license is not just a convenience; it is a rite of passage. Although the age requirement for getting a license may vary across the country anywhere from 15 to 18, the ritual is still the same. As close to your birthday as possible, you rush to the Department of Motor Vehicles to declare yourself independent.

Any new driver's next move is usually to begin looking for a car of his/her own. However, with Governor Mitt Romney's new plan for car insurance in the state of Massachusetts, that may begin to change.

In an attempt to create more competition in the insurance market, the proposed plan will raise the premiums for anyone who falls into the "inexperienced driver" category. This includes anyone who has possessed a license for less than six years. Currently in Massachusetts, the high-risk rate for young drivers is partially subsidized by spreading the high cost out among other drivers. So, the idea behind the plan is that raising the rate for the ones at risk will cut a break to those who have already proven themselves as drivers.

Certain things would affect the rise in cost. On average, if a student has passed a driver training program, his/her premium would jump about 21 percent, or $613. If the student has not passed such a course, the average premium will see a 48 percent increase, to as much as $4,897. However, if the "inexperienced driver" does not plan to buy a car and is assigned as an "occasional driver" on a family car, his/her rates may actually drop by the $31 fee he/she pays to subsidize his peers who have their own cars.

The majority of young people will most likely be vehemently opposed to this change, but unfortunately for those below the voting age, their opinion doesn't carry much weight. And although some of us, as college students, still fall into that "inexperienced category," we still have to acknowledge that this plan may actually have a purpose.

Massachusetts drivers have the highest accident rate in the country, and while inexperienced drivers represent only 10 percent of the state's drivers, they make up 20 percent of all property damage liability claims. The problem, however, is that 10 percent, under this new plan, may be tempted to simply drive without insurance if the prices skyrocket so much.

It may be a good idea to try to reward the good drivers and discourage young ones from buying cars right away; many other states run their auto insurance industry this way. Teenage driving safety is an issue that must be addressed. However, any new regulations that are so drastic that they push new drivers to break the law should be reconsidered. You cannot just charge people nearly 50 percent more for their insurance in one year. The subsidies should be gradually eliminated, the rates raised progressively. That way, everyone will benefit.

A bureaucracy of fraud

Jeffrey Napolitano

It has been said by some that the recent SGA elections were properly found to be invalid by two different branches of government, demonstrating that the checks and balances of the government work; members of the Judiciary and Senate acted appropriately when they tossed out the recent election. This is nonsense. The Judiciary and Senate have made many mistakes over the course of the last month, in some cases outright violations of the constitution. What we have seen recently is a small group of venal, lying, politicians-in-the-making using this poorly constructed facade of legitimacy to defend its decision to discard a democratic election.

Despite what has been written over the past week, the Judiciary botched its decision. It started when Jared Nokes filed an injunction against the Instant Runoff Voting (IRV) ballot system. The Judiciary then violated the constitution outright when Keith Kelley, the Associate Chief Justice, issued an injunction against the use of IRV without even holding a hearing, without even involving the defendant in the case. What it is even more disturbing about this is that Kelley set the hearing date for the case after the elections. There was one day before the elections on which a hearing could have been held, thus clearing up the matter before any student cast his or her vote, but Nokes, in his petition, conveniently claimed that it couldn't take place that day because he planned "to be engaged in academic-related activities" that day. When this hearing eventually took place a couple of weeks ago, and Nokes was asked what activities he was actually involved in, he suspiciously could not recall what was so important.

The errors and constitutional violations of the Judiciary would fill another entire column, so I'll restrict myself to the more egregious instances. First of all, the Judiciary was supposed to rule solely on what was brought forth in Nokes' injunction, which consisted of a single issue: that IRV fails to determine a winner by plurality, meaning that one candidate has more votes than any other. During the course of the hearing, Nokes called up witnesses who were confused by IRV (implying that they lacked the cognitive capacity of making a simple list), brought up graphs and charts, yet never adequately addressed the very issue of his injunction.

The fact of the matter, easily discovered by the most cursory search for the truth, is that the IRV results not only in a plurality, but then constructs a majority between the two leading candidates. Regardless, in the recent election, Bustamante and Murphy won by both a majority and a plurality, something completely ignored by the Judiciary. The Judiciary failed in its very simple responsibility to rule on the issue, but it also violated the bylaws by allowing Kelley to author the majority ruling, a task mandated of the Chief Justice, Marina Grullón. So, the Justice who improperly issued an injunction was the same Justice who unconstitutionally authored a majority opinion throwing out the elected president and trustee. At the same time it rejected a more democratic system of voting which has been ruled as constitutional elsewhere, the Judiciary did the most destructive thing any ruling body can do: it discarded the results of a popular election.

There's not much that can officially be done now, aside from waiting for Bustamante and Murphy to be reelected, come April 29.

The politics of the current senate read like some sort of perverse, incestuous collaboration. Patrick Higgins and Tim Daly have been praised for defending the "violated rights" of students, yet no one has pointed out that these two, specifically Higgins — who voted to throw out the elections — were in the elections and lost them. How can Mark Morrison say that he and Dave Carr should step down because they had a part in throwing the elections out, then go on to praise the losers of the election who also had a part in tossing the very elections they lost? Furthermore, key campaign members for Higgins and Daly, Adrienne Girard and Brian Roberts, are also senators, and not surprisingly, voted to throw out the elections. The layers of political inbreeding in the SGA are staggering.

The Senate was perhaps most grossly guilty of violating its own office in the meeting two Wednesdays ago. It is dictated in the Constitution that in that meeting, there is to be a vote on the ratification of the election. That some senators refused to even discuss the most important issue of the year, the same issue 100-plus members of the student body had turned out to see, is a crystal clear indication that fairness or rule of law had nothing to do with their decision. That these same senators claimed to do so in the student interest should be even more offensive to those they allege to represent.

Nokes, in charge of the agenda for the meeting, had placed the ratification of the elections on the agenda by Tuesday. By Wednesday night, in violation of the Constitution, the issue had mysteriously disappeared from the agenda. After hours in session, after finally getting the ratification on the agenda, and the subsequent voting down of the ratification, Nokes was sworn in as President. By means of the vote against the ratification, which included the "nay" vote of his roommate, Higgins, Nokes was able to seize the Presidency. That's right — the person primarily responsible for throwing out the elections, who then became president, and the loser of the elections, Patrick Higgins, are roommates. It's a small world, isn't it?

Again and again it has been proclaimed that the elections were a travesty because Berkshire D.C. was closed. First of all, it was only closed half of the time during the elections, due to the understaffing of the Elections Commission. Secondly, another voting station was open only 650 feet away, and hundreds of Southwest residents still found a way to vote. This wasn't close enough, said Tim Busiere when speaking out against ratification, implying that students were moronic cripples because, "Three minutes [walk] is like three miles to UMass students."

There's not much that can officially be done now, aside from waiting for Bustamante and Murphy to be re-elected, come April 29. There will not be much time left in the semester then, but hopefully in the fall the same people who make their voices heard now will vote in a more serious bunch of senators. That way, we won't have to tolerate any more of the hysterics of the current crop.

Support should stem from friends

Allison Edles

Both personal growth and emotional well-being are two key things that are vital for a college student to adapt and excel in a college environment. And when students find themselves having trouble coping with typical college obstacles, many of them can now look to their place of education for guidance and assistance rather than friends or loved-ones. Many public and private colleges today are trying to extend their services to students that go beyond typical healthcare and physical well-being, such as counseling for low test scores and rocky relationships.

While no students should be without somewhere to turn for their problems, part of growing up and leaving the comfort of home is learning how to deal with their own problems. The University is widely responsible for their students' well-being, but at a higher education level, is not required, nor expected, to serve as full-time parents to its students.

Nowadays, the term "in loco parentis" seems to take on new meaning when it comes to higher education. According to the legal dictionary, "in loco parentis" is Latin for "in place of a parent" or "a person or institution that assumes parental rights and duties for a minor." Often, many public schools are required to adopt this doctrine for their students, specifically students not enrolled in higher forms of education such as a college or university. And while it has been loosely upheld by many universities, the typical college students are no longer minors and, therefore, should be able to rely on their place of education much less for personal matters such as having a bad day or not getting the job that they applied for.

For example, at Amherst College, students have available to them many therapists through the school's counseling centers where they are free to talk about whatever may be ailing them. While many public colleges and universities offer counseling for students coping with suicide, depression, and eating disorders, Amherst College is now offering in its counseling sessions discussion of topics as mundane as roommate problems or getting a first C on an exam.

At Washington University in St. Louis, students recently celebrated Sleep Awareness Week in an effort to address the poor sleeping habits of its students. The university has also encouraged its residential assistants to refrain from bragging to their residents about how few hours of sleep they can have and still get by on.

A university's health services will provide for counseling if a student truly needs it, but dealing with personal problems is a natural coming-of-age skill that should not be left to a university to provide.

A lot of this gearing toward the students' personal growth and emotional well-being has seemed to come with the ever growing expectations that parents have of finer universities to provide for their children. If parents are going to be paying for their child's college tuition and fees, it's only natural for them to expect that their child will be well taken care of in their absence. The problem here lies in the fact that they are no longer children, in the school's eyes or in the government's eyes. A university's health services will provide for counseling if a student truly needs it, but dealing with personal problems is a natural coming-of-age skill that should not be left to a university to provide.

One other drawback of having universities treat typical problems that students may be facing is that there is a great risk of turning these "problems" into medical situations. The root of all these troubles lies in the developmental path of life and everyone experiences them. It's why college is there, to help you work through all the strife and ease the transition into the real world, all the while providing students with an education. While one student is talking to a counselor about how his goals aren't working out exactly how he planned in his first semester of college, another student is sitting in a room judging her body image rather than speaking to someone about it and trying to get help.

College students know well enough that, if they're in trouble, they need to seek help of some sort. However, relying on the university to get you through a bad exam is taking the university for granted. If this continues, this generation's students will become very cushioned and comfortable in how they deal with their "problems" and will continue to identify a stressful exam or sitting alone on a Friday night as serious "problems." Friends and family have always been the basis of most students' developmental and social lives and should continue to be when it comes to matters of emotional well-being and personal growth, not the university.

A language of liberals

It's been said that George W. Bush has invented his own language over the course of his presidency. They say it's a language crafted to fool weak-minded Americans into buying into his "American Empire." Some have even compared it to "Newspeak," the invented language of Oceania, the totalitarian state of George Orwell's 1984. If that isn't the pot calling the kettle black, I don't know what is.

The truth is that liberals came up with their own language a long time ago. Much like Orwell's "Newspeak," it's intended to create a citizenry incapable of questioning the policies of the Left, because they lack the vocabulary to even form the thoughts.

Never underestimate the power of language. It frames our ideas. Those who select the language we use in the course of public debate can also guide the minds of the people to see the issues in a light favorable to one side.

I guess that's why I have such difficulty talking to liberals sometimes. Though we're both speaking English, we aren't speaking the same language. Sorry, I don't speak Liberal. Quite frankly, their vocabulary infuriates me. The terms "close-minded" and "ignorant" are used to mean "anyone who disagrees with liberals." When they say that there isn't enough "diversity" at UMass, they really mean that there are just too many darned white people. "Racism" has come to mean "anything that minorities don't like". The name of the upcoming pro-abortion demonstration scheduled for April 25 in Washington would make me laugh it weren't so sick — March for Women's Lives. I suppose that the organizers thought that this name had a better ring than what I would call it — March for Infanticide. Indeed, that's a perfect example of Newspeak in action — the organizers clearly want the public to see abortion as a women's health issue, and certainly not as the murder of unborn children. When they talk about it like that, it's hard to disagree with them, isn't it? That's exactly the point.

No word in the liberal lexicon irks me more than the word that they use to describe themselves — "progressive." Putting myself in the shoes of a liberal for a second, the term makes sense from their point of view. They have an image of an ideal society in their minds. Any people who fight for progress toward their Utopia are "progressive," and anyone who resists it is "backwards." Makes sense.

Ben Duffy

The problem is that I consider myself progressive too, although I don't agree with so-called "progressives" on much of anything. I guess I just have a very different idea of what constitutes progress. Perhaps that's what really angers me the most about the word — it seems to suggest that my idea of progress is invalid, and that I really ought to just shut up and get with the program. Don't hold your breath, I have no intention of getting with the program any time soon. If that qualifies me as a Neanderthal, so be it. Sticks and stones may break my bones, but names will never hurt me.

It's "progressive" to support Roe v. Wade. I'm sorry, but I don't think that the murder of 35 million unborn children is progress. To me, progress would be a constitutional amendment that recognizes the humanity and civil rights of the unborn child. Even more progressive than that would be a sense of responsibility for the actions we take. Yet more progressive would be a healthy respect for sex, the very process that creates human life.

It's "progressive" to perpetuate a system of affirmative action that was supposed to be temporary. America bought into racial preferences during the 1970s under the understanding that they would be gone in 20 years. Well it's been more than twenty years and it's still here. Its supporters point out that affirmative action is necessary because racism still exists today. True. But if we're waiting for the last trace of racism to be abolished from the world before we put the system of reverse discrimination to rest, then we must accept that affirmative action is not temporary at all. It's an impossible standard to achieve, and that's exactly why affirmative action supporters like it so much. Me, I think we ought to get more progressive. I'd like to move forward to the promised result of 20 years of affirmative action — a system that judges people solely on their merits. That's what I'd call progress.

As you can see, "progressives" are just as backwards in my mind as I am in theirs. People who refer to themselves as "progressives" really ought to take a step back and analyze what the label means. Is there really anyone out there who would call himself an anti-progressive? No, I don't think so. Liberals sometimes need to be reminded that their concept of progress is neither universal nor objective.

New comedy makes five big film mistakes

Solange Knowles (Nikki Johnson) and Lil' Bow Wow (DJ Johnson) play the two older Jonson family children in, "The Johnson Family Vacation."

BY LAUREN FREEMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The only reason to watch "The Johnson Family Vacation" is to educate one's self on how not to make a movie. If you want to laugh or be entertained this movie is not for you. However, aspiring filmmakers out there should not consider themselves too good for the bogus film. Horrible films like "Gigli" and now "The Johnson Family Vacation" provide the amateur filmmaker with a valuable opportunity to learn what not to do.

There are five mistakes that were apparent in this film for the first time. The first of which was a casting mistake, too many superstars with alternative agendas were crammed into one film.

"The Johnson Family Vacation" is chock full of stars who give their best performances in another entertainment medium. Cedric the Entertainer is always going to be best received as a stand up comic. In Cedric's case, the audience sits in anticipation waiting for him to tell a funny joke. Even though this film is a comedy, it is not that funny ... and part of the reason is because Cedric's ability to tell jokes is squashed by the contract between him and the mediocre screenwriters. There isn't enough room for improvisation.

Lil' Bow Wow who plays DJ Johnson is another example of an entertainer who works best in his original forum. Bow Wow's acting seems theatrical and over the top because he is stage ready as a Hip-hop artist and his movements are always huge. This doesn't play out so well on film. He ends up looking like a bad case of Attention Deficit Disorder.

Solange Knowles ,who plays flirty sister Nikki Johnson, is Beyonce Knowles' up and coming little sister. There is something automatically annoying about a sibling who latches onto a more accomplished sibling's career and uses it as a launch pad. But there is something exceedingly unsettling about those desperate stars that bank on the appearance of their older siblings and look like a little creepy clone.

Grade B-

The second major flaw was a production mistake. This project had more than two feature film debuts.

Almost every major character in this film should form the production's backbone, but with such a flooding of stars the film just seems muddy. This was a huge risk to take and it was unsuccessful to say the least.

Lets take a look at the amount of cumulative filmic experience that went into this production. TV writing brothers, Todd R. Jones and Earl Richey Jones, wrote the screenplay. Their transition from little screen to big was not a smooth one. This is Cedric the Entertainer's debut as a leading role in a feature film. Knowles is making her film debut in a minor role. This is the first feature film for music video director Christopher Erskin. And finally, this is the feature length debut of the producers, Wendy Park and Eric Rhone. Did anybody on this film crew know what they were doing?

The next major error was a screenwriting mistake. This film set up character traits and situations that never paid-off.

Say the name Shannon Elizabeth and high school as well as college-age boys will come running with tongues wagging. After watching the film, the fact that she is a hot female body being exploited for the sole reason of attracting an otherwise disinterested young adult male audience is obvious. Her character has a lot of potential. She is a kleptomaniac with an alligator for a pet and the tendency to go into a catatonic state when praying to the zombie gods. But her character is abandoned five minutes after she is picked up and there is never any explanation for her arrival in the first place.

Next a conceptual mistake was piled onto the heap of blunders. Basing a screenplay on an idea that has been done terrifically several times before was to but it mildly a huge risk.

If you think you can do it better than those who've come before you then give it a whirl. But you better do it better because looking like a cheap knockoff of virtually all of "Chevy Chase's National Lampoon's Vacation" hits is a big no-no.

Finally character mistakes such as neglecting characters whenever they don't fit nicely into a scene pock-marked this film.

Destiny, the little sister character played by cute-as-a-button Gabby Soleil, is underused and underdeveloped. The problem of character neglect arises due to the restricted location of the film. Many of the scenes are set in the claustrophobic van and/or hotel rooms. When the scene calls for dialogue between mom and dad and nobody else, one can almost hear the screenwriter's saying: "just have the rest of the occupants in the car sleeping. That'll seem natural." Yet in fact, it seemed forced and awkward. How many long trips with kids have you been on that everybody just happened to sleep at the same time?

Learning what to do is a classroom experience. Intellectuals are protected from reality at the collegiate level and are rarely told what not to do. Only in the real world do mistakes become glaringly obvious. "The Johnson Family Vacation" is a rare opportunity to view a monstrous mistake that managed to slip through the cracks in the studio floor and seep onto the silver screen.

Ella is an unusual princess who befriends both elves and ogres.

BY TAMMI MUNN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It is time to enter the enchanted world of fabulous Frell, a land unlike any other Cinderellian setting anyone has ever seen. It is a semi-medieval town, yet speckled here and there with modern references. Picture a shopping mall — complete with wooden escalator — and a community center and Frell Community College.

'Ella Enchanted'
Directed by Tommy O'Haver
Starring Anne Hathaway Hugh Dancy
Rated PG
101 mins
Grade B+

Anne Hathaway, who after "The Princess Diaries" and "Ella Enchanted" has mastered clumsy, comedic roles, stars as the Cinderella of Frell. She has the typical good-hearted character of a Cinderella, but she is a modern-day woman. She's outspoken, has strong ideals and is not dreaming of prince charming. She even stages pro-ogre, elf and giant protests.

The Prince Charming (Hugh Dancy) is of course handsome, but hates the political spotlight and is reluctant to be a leader. He is scheduled to take over the kingdom very shortly from his uncle, King Edgar, played by "The Princess Bride" star Cary Elwes. Elwes is no stranger to funky fairy tale films.

The king has a snake as his trusty sidekick that aids him in his evil endeavors. The snake, though funny at times, seems superfluous and is only present to have a talking animal element in the film.

Ella's widowed father marries a nasty woman and two prince-loving stepsisters complete the package. The sisters begin to wallpaper their new bedroom walls with posters of the prince and one sister is even the president of the Prince's fan club.

The Prince is not impressed by Ella's stepsisters, but finds himself quite intrigued by Ella. She wants nothing to do with him because she does not believe in his or his uncle's political decisions. It seems the more Ella loathes the prince, the more he loves her. He tries to be chivalrous, but she will have none of it unless she inadvertently gets into a sticky situation.

Every child in Frell is given a special gift at birth and Ella's is obedience. She must obey every command that every person gives her. It turns out to be more of a curse than a gift. One of the stepsisters figures out Ella's "gift" and uses it to her advantage. The curse is forcing Ella to do some very bad things that her character should not do. To remedy this, she goes on a quest to find the fairy who gave her the "gift."

The film is a Cinderella story with ogres, elves, giants, talking books and politics. Ella doesn't cook or clean like the typical Cinderella, but she suffers just as much under the necessary curse. There are so many versions of Cinderella, and yet, amazingly there is some way to change the story's details again to make it different from all the others.

"Ella Enchanted" is a wonderfully comedic and warm story that brings new light to an old tale.

Anne Hathoway and Hugh Dancy star in the classic fairy tale influenced film titled 'Ella Enchanged.'

'Wonderfalls' takes the fall in tough TV season

BY LYNN ELBER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The voice mail message is succinct: "You've reached what used to be the 'Century City' production office. We are closed."

That's the epitaph a canceled series gets, one also due Fox's fanciful drama "Wonderfalls." Like CBS' "Century City," "Wonderfalls" aired only a handful of times before it was axed last week.

Some observers say the casualty toll indicate a weak field of midseason shows, including such struggling efforts as ABC's "Stephen King's Kingdom Hospital" and CBS' "The Stones."

Todd Holland, a creator and executive producer of "Wonderfalls," thinks the analysis misses the point. What's happening, he says, reflects a sea change in entertainment in general – and not for the better.

Studios write off movies that don't "open big," with an impressive debut tally, just as networks hastily dump shows that don't make an immediate and serious dent in the Nielsen ratings, Holland said.

"You really have a hard time commanding a network's patience and attention, the same way you do a movie studio's patience and attention," Holland said.

He recalled the fate of "Krippendorf's Tribe," the 1998 film he directed and which starred Richard Dreyfuss.

"I got a call Friday night, opening night at 7 o'clock, and the president of Touchstone told me, 'Sorry, we just couldn't open the picture,'" Holland said.

That meant marketing quickly was abandoned, along with any chance for the film to build an audience. In TV terms, "Wonderfalls" got roughly the same bum's rush.

To start with, the series required careful handling. A comic drama about a discontented young woman (Caroline Dhavernas) who lives near Niagara Falls, works in a souvenir shop and starts hearing directives from tacky animal figurines, it obviously wasn't a cookie-cutter entry.

(Holland says he and co-creator Bryan Fuller came up with the idea at the same time "Joan of Arcadia" was created, but the hit CBS series about a teenager who hears from God made it to TV first.)

"Wonderfalls" also needed the right time slot to attract the young demographic that Fox courts and for whom the show seemed designed. And, finally, it needed breathing room to establish itself.

In the current fashion of network TV, it got none of the above.

The series was stranded at 9 p.m. EST Friday, when a chunk of the typically elusive young audience tends to be out, with an excursion to Thursday – against NBC's powerhouse reality series "The Apprentice."

(Fox, which declined to comment, gets some credit for teaming "Wonderfalls" with a spiritual partner on Thursday: It followed "Tru Calling," about a young woman who hears calls for help from the dead.)

Expansive marketing was lacking. "There is a correlation between advertising and promotional spending and return," observed Holland.

Two Fox shows that received elaborate brass-band welcomes, "Malcolm in the Middle" (said to be the beneficiary of a $6 million launch in 2000) and newcomer "The O.C.," are thriving.

"Everyone knows that hits are made, that you nurture a show ... you give it a great time slot and a lot of promotion, and then the show has to earn its audience, to keep it," said Holland, whose extensive credits include "Malcolm in the Middle" and "The Larry Sanders Show."

Maybe "Wonderfalls" eventually could have drawn viewers by virtue of what Holland calls as "wicked bad-boy comedy, but with heart," which he saw as very Fox-friendly in the spirit of "The Simpsons."

Four episodes, however, and it was over Holland's pleas for one more airing were rebuffed by Fox.

Patience is not a virtue these days, particularly when networks can get easy, immediate ratings gratification from reality shows.

No go on Worcester fire movie

WORCESTER (AP) — Hollywood executives said they shelved plans to make a movie about the 1999 Worcester warehouse fire in which six city firefighters died because of opposition from victims' families and firefighters across North America.

The film about the Dec. 3 blaze at Worcester Cold Storage and Warehouse Co., in which actors Woody Harrelson and Ed Harris had agreed to appear and Danny Boyle of Britain to direct, was scheduled to begin shooting May 10 in Toronto.

In a joint statement issued on Tuesday by Warner Bros. Pictures, which planned to distribute the film, and Imagine Entertainment, the production company owned by Ron Howard, officials said the making of a film the size and scope they had in mind was a complex process that needed the support of various groups and individuals, including firefighters.

"Due to circumstances beyond our control, we no longer have such support," the movie company officials said in the brief statement. "We have therefore decided not to move ahead with this project at this time."

"This was a David versus Goliath battle, but we were persistent in our opposition to this movie," Frank Raffa, president of Local 1009 Worcester Fire Fighters, told the Telegram & Gazette of Worcester. Raffa had written to high-ranking national and regional firefighter union officials in the United States and Canada, asking for their support.

Opponents said they feared the film would graphically show how the firefighters died, opening emotional wounds for the families and children of the dead firefighters.

The movie was to be based on the Dec. 3, 1999, blaze that took the lives of Firefighters Paul A. Brotherton, Jeremiah M. Lucey and Joseph T. McGuirk and Lts. Timothy P. Jackson, James F. Lyons III and Thomas E. Spencer.

Only the families of Lts. Lyons and Jackson supported the movie.

The screenplay for "Worcester Cold Storage" was written by Worcester native Scott Silver, who wrote the script for the movie "8 Mile."

The movie was to have been based on former Boston Herald reporter Sean Flynn's book "3000 Degrees: The True Story of a Deadly Fire and the Men Who Fought It," published by Warner Books.

More heroics from Ortiz

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Curt Schilling witnessed what the Boston Red Sox saw so many times last year, a long homer by David Ortiz.

Schilling pitched eight innings in his Fenway Park debut for Boston and Ortiz hit a two-run homer in the 12th Sunday that gave the Red Sox a 6-4 win over the Toronto Blue Jays.

"I had seen from afar, last year, his second half, and today I got to experience it a little bit," Schilling said. "It was phenomenal."

Ortiz hit his third homer of the season Sunday after hitting just two through the end of last May. He hit 29 the rest of the way and finished third in slugging percentage in the AL.

Blue Jays	4
Red Sox	6

Mark Bellhorn hit a tying single in the ninth and Bill Mueller led off the 12th with a walk. Had Ortiz not driven in Mueller, Manny Ramirez was on deck.

"I told David before he went to home plate, 'Finish this, man. We don't get paid overtime,'" said Ramirez, who has a $160 million, eight-year contract. "And he did it."

Ortiz nearly won the game in the bottom of the ninth with Bellhorn at second, but center fielder Vernon Wells made a leaping catch against the wall for the third out.

"This is a team, offensively, that you don't want to give us too many chances," Schilling said.

So with the temperature in the low 40s, Ortiz made sure the fans who remained from Boston's 67th straight home sellout didn't have to stay any longer.

"It was getting cold out there, man," he said.

Schilling, obtained from Arizona in a Nov. 28 trade, allowed four runs and six hits in eight innings, struck out 10 and walked none. He beat Baltimore 4-1 Tuesday in his first start of the season.

Eric Hinske's first homer of the year gave Toronto a 4-2 lead in the sixth following a single by Josh Phelps on an 0-2 pitch. Schilling slammed his glove several times after returning to his dugout following the inning.

"I've got two outs and nobody on and an 0-2 count and a lot of freedom to do some different things and I made a bad pitch and they end up getting two runs off that hanging splitter," Schilling said.

In Game 2, Dayton scored an unearned run in first that lasted all the way to the fifth. Junior Pam Sulick started the fifth inning rally by reaching on an error by the shortstop. With tying run on first, Sortino put senior Nicole Wilson to pinch run for Sulick.

Sortino called for Budrewicz to put down a bunt to sacrifice the runner to second, but the Flyers didn't react to the ball fast enough and the senior outfielder legged out an infield single.

Freshman Amanda Morin followed Budrewicz' lead and laid a bunt single of her own to load the bases.

"You have asked [Dayton] about the double bunts," Sortino said. "We wanted to move the runners over since easier to score from third then second. I never expected them not to pick up the ball and I thought we would have an out and a runner on third."

After Stefanoni popped out, sophomore Lesley Ferrara came on to pinch hit for Aisha Franke.

Ferrara had already come through with a pinch-hit single to enforce the mercy rule in the first game, as she hit a hard grounder up the middle to score the tying and go ahead run for a 2-1 lead.

"I got into to pinch hit and coach [Sortino] said to me, 'We don't need a big hit or anything, just get the ball on the ground for a base hit. Don't push too much, just relax and hit the ball,'" Ferrara said.

The pitching duo of sophomore Jenna Busa and junior Kelli Arnold continue to keep the opposing run count. Neither pitcher sacrificed an earned run during the doubleheader.

Busa gave up only three hits with five strikeouts to improve to 10-5 on the season. Arnold scattered two hits and a walk in a dominating performance on the mound. She also fanned nine batters and is now 8-5 on the season.

"I thought Jenna struggled today though she only gave up three hits," Sortino said. "She just wasn't herself and kind of in and out. She's knows it and worked out in the bullpen."

"I thought Kelli did a relatively good job," Sortino said. "I don't think they should have got that run. It was an unearned run. That kid should have gotten by us, but we will talk about that at practice."

Kovalev was ready to be that player, with a little help from Theodore.

Trailing a rush initiated by Theodore and led by Canadiens captain Saku Koivu, the Russian winger came through the slot and took a backhand pass from Koivu before beating Raycroft from a sharp angle 2:16 into the game.

Despite playing just 31 seconds in the opening period, Hilbert tied it at 6:34. He stopped Montreal defenseman Sheldon Souray's clearing attempt at the blue line and beat Theodore with a long wrist shot.

Theodore started another scoring play that led to Kovalev's second goal at 15:24. The goalie gave the puck to defenseman Craig Rivet, who shot along the right boards from behind Montreal's net.

Kovalev flipped the puck past defenseman Hal Gill at the Canadiens' blue line and broke down the ice on a two-on-one with Richard Zednik before beating Raycroft with a quick shot from the faceoff circle into the top right corner.

Markov gave Montreal a two-goal lead when he scored on a 4-on-4 in the second period. Koivu got his second assist on the goal as Markov scored into an open left side off a rebound of Zednik's shot.

Rolston ensured a tight finish when he scored 3:35 into the third period on a slap shot that struck Theodore's left skate and beat him through the legs.

Mickelson wins first major

MASTERS from page 8

the tee to avoid the bunkers and hit his approach behind the hole. Mickelson got a huge break with Chris DiMarco blasted out of a greenside bunker and just beyond Mickelson's ball marker, giving him the line on the biggest putt of his life.

"I just couldn't believe that ball fell in there," Mickelson said.

Before walking into the scoring hut to sign his card, Mickelson held daughter Sophia and said, "Daddy won. Can you believe it?"

Mickelson, who shot a 31 on the back, finished at 9-under 279. Mike Weir, whose victory last year made him the first southpaw to win the Masters, slipped the green jacket on the most famous Lefty in golf.

It was a bitter end for Els, who now knows how Mickelson has felt all these years. The big South African did nothing wrong over the final 12 holes, salvaged four crucial pars along the way and it still wasn't enough.

"I think Phil deserved this one," Els said. "He won this one. He didn't lose it like some of his other ones. Full credit to him."

K.J. Choi holed a 5-iron from 220 yards on the 11th hole for eagle, kept his hopes alive with a 40-foot birdie putt on the 13th but wound up with a 69, three shots behind.

Tiger Woods was long gone before the fireworks started. He made a double bogey — his third of the tournament — on the 13th hole and shot 71, leaving him 11 shots out of the lead in a tie for 22nd, his worst finish ever at the Masters.

Woods now has gone seven majors without winning, and he has played his last five over par. But this Masters didn't need him to deliver the drama.

With aces and eagles, so many spectacular shots along the back nine that the gallery was out of breath, it came down to Mickelson and Els in a duel as good as any at a major championship.

Els, playing two groups ahead of Mickelson, beat him on the par 5s with an eagle and a birdie.

Mickelson answered with an approach to the dangerous 14th that grazed the cup for a tap-in birdie, and a 15-foot birdie on the par-3 16th, a hole that has haunted him in the past.

"Baby!" Mickelson said as he trotted off the green, tied for the lead with two holes to play.

Playing the final hole, Els hit into a bunker so deep he could only see the hazy sky. He blasted out and said, "Be right!" and it stopped some 25 feet behind the cup. His birdie putt turned just left of the hole.

Els was on the practice green, preparing for a playoff, when he heard the loudest roar of the day.

Mickelson made the putt. Mickelson won the Masters.

Late blooming triumph

Surge leads to fourth straight win

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

For the first 25 minutes Friday night, it looked like all the momentum the No. 19 Massachusetts men's lacrosse team had built during its three-game winning streak was fading away.

But just as the sun dipped below the horizon behind Boyden Gymnasium, the Minutemen turned up the heat, and scored 14 unanswered goals to beat the Manhattan Jaspers, 16-4. Chris Doyle scored a career-high four goals in the game, and helped the Minutemen improve their record to 6-4. The Jaspers fall to 5-4.

Manhattan had a lead for a combined 15:31 in the first half, until Doyle's first goal of the game tied it up at 11:45 of the second quarter. UMass defenseman Steven Byrnes scored an unlikely goal four minutes earlier, whipping a shot with his longpole on the run, giving the Minutemen enough momentum to carry into the locker room, spurred by Doyle's tally with 2:05 to go.

Jamie Yaman scored the eventual game-winner with 2:36 remaining, but the goal that made it 5-4 was only the beginning of a UMass onslaught that took over the game, hardly allowing any sustained offensive pressure from Manhattan.

The first night game at UMass since April 30, 1999 started very slow for the Minutemen. Junior Eugene Tanner gave the Jaspers a 2-1 lead at the end of the first quarter with an extra-man goal at 11:04, and the UMass team that had won three straight was nowhere to be found. Greg Lewis and Justin Otto both scored in the second quarter to push the lead to 4-2, before Byrnes, Doyle, and Yaman began the UMass rally.

Junior Chris Doyle (7), seen here warding off Albany's Lee Busino on March 16, scored a career-high four goals Friday night in the Minutemen's 16-4 win over Manhattan.

In the third, Gene Tundo scored the only goal of the quarter to make it 7-4, but the Minutemen held a clear advantage for much of the period.

"After that, the shots just started to go for us, and Manhattan played their style as long as they could," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "When you stretch a lead, you can't play that way. We were able to shoot the ball, and play really really good defense, so we were really solid there in the second half."

The Minutemen scored 10 goals in the fourth quarter to punctuate the victory, including Doyle's third and fourth of the game, as well as the first goals of freshmen Pat Larmon and Dennis Whelan's careers. Freshman Sam Moody also scored his second of the season, as the Minutemen completely emptied their bench, including backup goaltenders Scott Hinchey and Efosa Guobadia.

Doyle's outburst gave him a team-high 19 goals on the season, which equals his previous season high, set last year. Doyle has come on strong as of late, scoring 10 goals in the last four games.

"He's been pretty consistent throughout the year," Cannella said. "He was a little frustrated early in the year. I think having Sean [Morris] back really helps him. He's been very consistent in practice, so it doesn't surprise me at all that he had a day like this."

Morris, who missed the first four games of the season due to mononucleosis, scored a goal and three assists Friday.

The goal total was the second highest on the season for the Minutemen, who beat Penn State 17-8 on April 3.

Lefty, at last

Mickelson wins first major with Masters thriller

By Doug Ferguson
Associated Press

AUGUSTA, Ga. (AP) — Finally!

Phil Mickelson's agonizing pursuit of a major ended Sunday at the Masters when he made an 18-foot birdie putt on the final hole, a spectacular conclusion to a back-nine duel with Ernie Els.

Gone is that ugly streak of being 0-for-42 in golf's biggest events. Gone are questions about Mickelson's game and whether it could stand up to the scrutiny of a major championship.

He delivered a command performance to the very end, with two birdies on the final three holes for a 3-under 69 that gave him a one-stroke victory over Els.

The putt curled into the back of the hole, setting off an enormous cheer. Mickelson jumped and thrust his fists, then kissed his ball when he plucked it from the cup.

"Oh my God!" he said as he walked off the green and into the arms of his wife and three children.

Until Sunday, he was known as the best player to have never won a major.

Now, he's simply one of the best in the game.

His awesome skills were on full display along the back nine at Augusta National, and they had to be. Els was flawless, making two eagles in his round of 67 that looked as though it would be enough to get the green jacket he covets, and the third leg of the Grand Slam.

But Mickelson was more determined than ever.

He rattled off three straight birdies to stay in range, caught Els with a 15-foot birdie putt on the 16th and then had the stage to himself on No. 18.

Despite a half-dozen close calls in the majors, Mickelson had never come to the final hole with a share of the lead. He never had the final say.

On this day, he refused to let his chance get away.

He smartly played a 3-wood off

Kovalev's pair dooms Bruins

Montreal Canadiens goaltender Jose Theodore makes a save as the Boston Bruins' Patrice Bergeron is pushed into the net by Jan Bulis during Sunday's Stanley Cup Playoff game in Montreal.

MONTREAL (AP) — Alex Kovalev finally showed up in Montreal, just in time to get the Canadiens back in the playoff hunt.

Kovalev scored two first-period goals, both assisted by goalie Jose Theodore, and Montreal beat the Boston Bruins 3-2 Sunday night.

Andrei Markov also scored for the Canadiens, who now trail their first-round playoff series 2-1 after scoring just once while losing the first two games in Boston.

Bruins	2
Canadiens	3

An enthusiastic, sellout Bell Centre crowd of 21,273 erupted in cheers on both of Kovalev's goals, each of them giving Montreal a lead, the second one for good.

Kovalev had just four points — including an assist on Patrice Brisebois' goal in Friday's 2-1 overtime loss — in his first 14 games with the Canadiens, who acquired him in a trade with the New York Rangers on March 2.

Theodore set up the rushes that led to both goals and became just the third goalie to record two assists in an NHL playoff game, and the second — following Edmonton's Grant Fuhr — to do so in the same period.

Boston's Andy Hilbert scored in his first career playoff game in the first period, and Brian Rolston drew the Bruins within one when he scored early in the third.

Theodore, who allowed rookie Patrice Bergeron's goal 1:26 into overtime Friday, made 21 saves.

Bruins rookie Andrew Raycroft, who had a shutout in his first playoff game Wednesday, stopped 29 shots.

Electrified by a pregame slide show on the ice depicting their storied franchise's 24 Stanley Cup-winning teams and Hall-of-Fame legends Maurice Richard, Jean Beliveau and Guy Lafleur, the Montreal fans were ready for a current player to step forward.

Bears pull away from UM, Rutgers

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

Riding the momentum of a perfect season, the Massachusetts crew team arrived at the Seekonk River Saturday, with lofty expectations. Unfortunately for the Minutewomen, a team with even bigger expectations took home the victory.

Ranked fourth in the country, Brown solidified its self as a legitimate contender for the national title, defeating Massachusetts and Rutgers on its home course. The Bears took full advantage of their working knowledge of the course, winning all five races on choppy water.

UMass looked strong in the first varsity eight race, leading through the first 500 meters. UMass couldn't maintain a winning pace however, as Brown caught up to the Minutewomen and pulled ahead in the final 500 meters, claiming gold in the meet's highest-scoring event. Brown finished the race in 6:30.84 while UMass followed at 6:35.34, and the Scarlet Knights trailed at 6:47.56.

The five-second differentials between the three boats reflected a large margin of victory.

While the Bears surged to victory at the Invite, UMass and Rutgers locked in a struggle for silver. For the second varsity eights, Rutgers outpaced the Minutewomen by seven seconds, with a time of 7:23.68. Brown finished 28.56 seconds ahead of the Minutewomen.

The varsity four race saw Rutgers (8:31.44) outdistance UMass (9:07.58), while Brown crossed the finish line 36 seconds ahead of the Scarlet Knights.

Even though Rutgers placed second in three races to UMass' two, the Minutewomen were awarded silver because additional points are allotted to the first varsity eights.

In the novice races, UMass's second boat fell to Rutgers by 20 seconds but was redeemed by its counterpart, which bested the Scarlet Knights by two seconds. Brown's second novice eight rowed the course faster than both the UMass and Rutgers first novice eights.

Brown entered the weekend with a 2-3 record, while UMass was undefeated at 2-0. In last week's victory over defending national champion Radcliffe, the Bears posted the second-fastest time ever by a women's team on the Seekonk River. Its varsity eight dominated despite rough water in an attempt to thwart a Radcliffe repeat.

While it's unlikely UMass and Brown will meet in the NCAA Championships, the Minutewomen used the opportunity to measure themselves against the top competition in the country. While both Brown and UMass captured gold at the summer's Henley Women's Regatta, the two squads did not compete because they were in different divisions.

In an extremely short, six-race season, the Minutewomen won't have much time to work out the kinks. The Maroon and White travel to Collingswood N.J. for the Knecht Cup on April 17-18, and will then prepare for the Atlantic 10 Championships.

Kelley chasing record

Sophomore ties home run mark in pair of wins

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

In only her second season, sophomore third baseman K.J. Kelley has already etched her name into record books at the University of Massachusetts.

After a breakout freshman season with eight homeruns, Kelley took the first pitch from Dayton pitcher Melissa Myher over the right-center fence in the sixth inning in Game 2 of the Massachusetts softball team's doubleheader against the Flyers Friday. The Rainier, Ore. native's 11 round trippers this season ties Brandi Cross' single season homerun record, set only a year ago.

Kelley's homer sealed the second win for the Minutewomen (18-11, 4-0 Atlantic 10) as they swept the Flyers (10-23, 1-3 A-10), 8-0 and 4-1.

The Minutewomen have won 11 straight games and extended their home winning streak to 61, the longest in the nation.

The sophomore third baseman tied the record with 19 games left in the regular season. Her 19 career homers are only seven shy of the all-time mark (26), shared by Cross and Scooter Wheeler.

"To tell you the truth, I don't really think about it," Kelley said. "It's not something I have to think of during a game. I just take each at bat as one at bat and I'm just hoping for a hit, not a homerun. The results will come with the contact and my results happen to be homeruns."

As Kelley adds to a storybook career, senior K.C. Budrewicz is just looking for a happy ending. Budrewicz' homer in the second gave UMass a 1-0 lead. Sophomore Kristen Stefanoni lead off the second with single and scored two batters later on junior Hilary Puglia's double. The Maroon and White exploded for five runs in the fourth to put the game well out of reach.

Budrewicz, a Buckland native, went 2-for-3 with three runs batted in and two runs in the 8-0 game one victory.

"It feels good to able to perform after the hard work I put in over the years and show everyone I am here for a reason while being able to have fun out there too," Budrewicz said.

"I'm happy for K.C., because she's been waiting a longtime after starting off as a pinch runner," UMass head coach Elaine Sortino said. "She worked her way into a significant part of our program. Local kid, who was a camper at UMass and I'm really happy for her. She worked hard."

Student receives national award

By Gabriel Dye
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts' student Jennifer Griffin, a 20-year-old junior microbiology major, was recently awarded The Endocrine Society Summer Research Fellowship, a prestigious award received by only 20 to 25 students nationwide.

The Endocrine Society is the world's leading source for hormone research.

Griffin had been waiting since January to find out whether or not she had won. She received the call during the last days of spring break.

"My boyfriend called [to tell me I had won] when I was on my way home from Virginia," Griffin said. "I had him checking my emails while I was gone."

Griffin, a member of Commonwealth College, is only the second UMass student to win the award.

"I am really proud of Jennifer's accomplishments in the lab and this award of the [Endocrine Society] fellowship," said Dr. Deborah J. Good of the Veterinary and Animal Sciences Department, for whom Griffin works.

The Endocrine Society, established in 1917, is an international organization with 11,000 members spanning over 80 countries. Members research and treat endocrine disorders including dia-

Plans to close doors on pre-school

Pre-schooler Elissa Baker plays outside of Skinner Hall — on the the former home of the Early Childhood Laboratory School.

"It's spring!" a small boy gleefully shouts as he spots a blooming yellow tulip in the playground yard. The happy shrieks and screams of children echo off the brick walls of the Early Childhood Laboratory School at the University of Massachusetts.

Inside, the big blue and white classroom is full of energy, as the 3- and 4-year-old students of Classroom Five romp happily during play time.

Housed in the basement of Skinner Hall, the classroom is a childhood wonderland. The room is neatly organized and divided into stations and shelves. In one corner is an art section, full of easels, paint trays, and jars of paintbrushes, sequins, glitter and crayons. There are baskets of brightly colored blocks and games, trucks and cars, tools for building and costumes for pretend. In the back sits a two-story playhouse.

Kate McGee, a UMass undergraduate education student and student teacher, snuggles against the couch with a picture book in hand, with two small students lying in her lap. The classroom glows as the sun shines through the large bay windows overlooking the playground.

Then it is circle time. Sixteen pairs of bright little eyes gaze curiously at Kate Strub-Richards, a graduate teaching assistant. Strub-Richards rolls out a big blue plastic wading

Final Distinguished Faculty lecturer encourages exercise

By Michelle Dozois
Collegian Staff

Inactive people can greatly improve their health through small amounts of physical activity, said exercise science professor Patty Freedson yesterday in the fourth and final Distinguished Faculty Lecture of the year.

"You simply have to do a little bit of exercise to realize the largest health benefits," Freedson said.

Approximately 200 people filled the Massachusetts Room of the Mullins Center for Freedson's lecture, titled "When It Comes to Exercise, How Much is Enough?"

Freedson began her talk by asking the audience how they got to their seats.

"Who took the elevator to get up to this room? Who parked their car as close to the building as possible? Who drove here when you could have walked?" Freedson asked.

Freedson spoke about two exercise recommendations that she said have caused confusion among the public. In 1995, the American College of Sports Medicine and the Centers for Disease Control released a set of guidelines recommending that people engage in 30 minutes of moderate activity on most days of the week. But, in 2002, the Institute of Medicine recommended that people engage in at least an hour of moderately intense activity every day.

> "The idea of being a physical active person is a normal state of being."
> - Patty Freedson, Exercise Science professor

The media quickly interpreted the difference in recommendations as a conflict, Freedson said.

"That was completely the wrong message." Thirty minutes is the recommendation for those who want to achieve health benefits, while 60 minutes is the recommendation for people trying to lose weight or achieve a higher level of fitness, Freedson said.

"Some is better than none, and more is usually better than less."

Freedson gave examples of what defines light physical activity versus exercise. Going to the gym or playing tennis constitutes exercise, she said, whereas lifestyle activities are typically more moderate, such as "taking a walk to get to your destination, the thing that most of you chose not to do today."

Movement is natural, while sedentary behavior is not, Freedson said.

"The idea of being a physical active person is a normal state of being."

Freedson described the "Paleolithic Rhythm" of activity proposed by anthropologists, which says that in ancient times, society members took part in fairly intense physical activity for one to two days, and then rested for one to two days. However, their rest was very different from ours — they walked to other villages to visit friends and relatives.

Freedson cited the Industrial Revolution as a culprit for current obesity trends.

"Our society is structured in such a way that drives us to be inactive," she said. "[We have] 'people movers' that take the place of walking in an airport ... the response to this paradox, of being built to be active yet living a very sedentary lifestyle, leads us to incredibly high rates of chronic disease or disease risks."

In order for people to continue experiencing the benefits of exercise, they must continue exercising, Freedson said. Therefore, future exercise science research should integrate the help of psychologists, she said.

"We all know it's good for us, but how do we sustain that behavior change?"

Distinguished Faculty Lecturers are selected for their outstanding service to the University of Massachusetts, and are given the Chancellor's Medal, the highest honor a faculty member can receive from the University.

Before presenting Freedson with the Chancellor's Medal, Chancellor John V. Lombardi joked that while he admires Freedson's work, he doesn't want to have to take her advice regarding exercise.

"I have to confess that she said a lot of things I don't like," Lombardi said. "[Only] two hours a day on the computer — this is going to be a challenge," he said, referring to a Stanford University study Freedson discussed. The study examined the health effects of reducing sedentary behaviors, like sitting in front of a computer.

Freedson ended her talk with another push to forgo the elevator.

"My question for you — are you going to take the elevator to go downstairs?"

The audience laughed.

"Not today ... [but] how about tomorrow?" she said.

FBI, Justice Department to defend efforts before panel

By Curt Anderson
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — The nation's top law enforcement officials say they recognized the threat posed by al-Qaida in the months leading up to the Sept. 11 attacks, but members of the commission looking into the attacks say they want proof that concern equaled action.

The panel begins a new two-day hearing today with testimony from former FBI Director Louis Freeh, Attorney General John Ashcroft and former Attorney General Janet Reno. Thomas Pickard, who served as acting FBI director in the months just before the attacks, and former CIA counterterrorism center director Cofer Black also are scheduled to testify.

Aides to Ashcroft said he plans to rebut criticism that he was more focused on issues such as illegal drugs and gun crimes than terrorism before the attacks. They point to a May 9, 2001 Senate hearing in which Ashcroft testified his agency had "no higher priority" than protecting against terrorist attacks.

In an article in yesterday's Wall Street Journal, Freeh said the FBI "relentlessly did its job pursuing terrorists" before the attacks but was hampered by lack of resources and political will.

Commission members, who last week heard National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice defend the Bush administration's pre-Sept. 11 actions, are expected to ask Freeh, Ashcroft and the others why more wasn't done.

Member Slade Gorton, a Republican, has said the FBI "has more questions to answer" than does Rice or former presidential terrorism adviser Richard Clarke, who has said the Bush administration did not take the terrorism threat as seriously as did the Clinton administration.

"There has been a lot of talk about whether there was urgency or lack of urgency. We really don't care about the names, we care about what actions were taken," commission member Jamie Gorelick, a Democrat who served under Reno as deputy attorney general, said on NBC's "Today" show. "There is a major game of finger-pointing going on here. Our job is to get to the bottom of it."

The hearing comes on the heels of the weekend release of a previously classified Aug. 6, 2001, intelligence memo that warned al-Qaida was operating in the United States and might be looking to hijack planes. The memo did not provide specific times or places for potential attacks.

pool. "This is going to be our pond," she tells the children.

"We are making a conservatory," said Dorothy Meyer, director of the Early Child Laboratory School. "The kids got interested in making one after seeing the pond in the conservatory on campus. Now we need to get plants, and polliwogs, and some goldfish — all the things you'd find in a pond," she laughs. "We let the kids plan and think of their own ideas."

However, soon ideas like the conservatory will only be a memory for Meyer and her students.

Budget Cuts

In a decision made by Andrew Effrat, the interim dean of the school of education since September of 2002, the 71-year-old Early Child Laboratory School will close this May at the end of its academic year.

"It's a wonderful program," said Effrat. "But due to the budget cuts, [the school] is not in the position anymore to provide the same sort of subsidy."

According to Effrat, the school costs the School of Education approximately $75,000 a year. The School of Education has roughly a $5 million budget, and has absorbed a 25 to 30 percent budget cut from its previous $7 million budget. The cost of the Lab school to the School of Education consists of Meyer's full-time faculty member salary, plus benefits. The rest of the school's costs are supported by student tuition.

"These days that's a lot when you're talking about the University," said Effrat. "After absorbing budget cuts, that is a lot of money."

The Lab school accepts preschool students from the age of 2 years and 9 months to 5-year-olds. Enrollment is based on a first-come first-serve basis. The classrooms are composed of a wide variety of students, ranging from the children of graduate and undergraduate students at UMass, to the children of teachers and members of the outside community.

Effrat hopes to relocate the program to another needy community in Massachusetts, namely the Athol or Orange area. The program would become a full-day, five-day-a-week daycare center, rather than the three-day -a-week, three-hour Lab school program it is now.

"I don't think of it as closing," Effrat said. "We are suspending operations."

After Skinner Hall is renovated, the School of Nursing will move in. The building is out of code and is not handicapped accessible. The School of Nursing currently has no main building on the UMass campus.

Effrat says that due to budget cuts, he has had no choice but to cut programs. The School of Education currently has three departments sharing two secretaries. The number of staff has also shrunk considerably.

"I agree it [the Lab school] is a wonderful program. Unfortunately, we've been forced to curtail a number of other wonderful programs," he said.

When The Massachusetts Daily Collegian asked Effrat how many times he had visited the Lab school before deciding to close the program, Effrat said he had been there "at least three times."

Directing young lives

"I love our program," said Dorothy Meyer, director of the Lab school.

Meyer said she was notified last year that the Lab school would eventually have to move out of Skinner Hall for renovation purposes. However, she was assured by the School of Education that the Lab school would be provided with another building on the UMass campus. Meyer said she did not receive notice that the school had been officially ordered to close until she received an e-mail during spring break in March.

"I'm just incredibly sad that it's closing. I feel honored that I've been able to do wonderful things [at the school]," Meyer said. "I'm thankful to the University for providing this opportunity for me."

Meyer's work at the Lab school specializes in the teaching approach known as Reggio Emilia, which is a teaching principle that was developed in Italy. Reggio focuses on allowing the students to decide the curriculum rather than the teachers. Meyer described the process as a teacher-child partnership in learning.

"We ask the kids, what are they interested in, what are they wondering about," she said. "Then, we go explore that together."

UMass students

Meyer said that the curriculum of the Lab school is special not only because it uses the Reggio Emilia approach, but because of the teacher-training environment it provides for aspiring undergraduate and graduate students in the early childhood education program.

"There is a quote that I like to go by: 'Experience is not the best teacher, reflection on that experience is the best teacher,'" Meyer said.

Interns at the Lab school take on student teaching positions for a total of five credits per semester. At the end of the three-hour class day, Meyer sits with the interns and leads discussion, reflecting events that took place during class, encouraging the students to ask questions.

"The Lab school is why I came to UMass," said graduate student Melissa Shaeffer, a student teacher. "I was very interested in the Reggio Emilia approach."

Shaeffer said she looked at many other preschools that claim to practice the Reggio approach, but found UMass' program to be the best. Due to the school closing, she is rushing to complete a two-year graduate degree in early childhood in one year.

"That is [the School of Education's] fault," she said. "I learn more about the [Reggio] approach as I practice and experience it everyday. I really love children, and I love being able to see their minds go 'a-ha' when they grasp something."

The Lab school is equipped with an observation booth overlooking the classroom that is open to the public. Student teachers, guests and parents are able to sit in the booth and observe the classroom. Every April, Skinner Lab school hosts early childhood educators from all over the world to come and observe the school. This month, Meyer hosted an educator from Taiwan who hopes to create a similar Reggio approach program in her own country.

It is also hard for education students to find hands-on teaching opportunities in the outside community that work closely with student teachers, Straub-Richards said. She said she has observed many preschools in the community that have overworked teachers who do not have time to work one-on-one with student teachers.

"In the community, teachers can't help [student teachers] because they are too busy and have no time to reflect. ... We have an incredible school with lots of [UMass] students. The students are student-teachers, and they never sit back and watch," Straub-Richards said.

"It's really a shame it's closing down, there is no other place in the community for students to be trained [in Reggio]," she said. "I think [the School of Education] could look a little harder. The parents are devastated ... it's the women and children on the bottom of the totem pole."

The parents

Many parents of children attending the Early Childhood Laboratory School were expecting to enroll their children again in September. These parents are now forced to look elsewhere for their child's preschool education.

"It says a lot about the University to cut back on stuff like this," said Edward Dorshow, a parent from Sunderland. "It's a little disturbing."

Many parents are searching the community trying to find another preschool with an educational experience comparable to the Lab school — and affordable tuition.

"It's a big burden on students with kids," Dorshow said. "It's going to cost a lot more money [for the Lab school] to relocate."

The tuition prices of local preschools vary. Skinner Lab school charges $1,050 for a year's tuition, which includes three half days a week.

Prices for other schools include The Valley Christian School in Northampton, which charges $1,500. The Cornerstone Christian School in Greenfield, which charges $1,420, and Holy Trinity in Greenfield, which costs $1,500, administrators at each of the school say.

In Amherst, the Common School costs $6,825 for a year, and includes a five-day program only. The Buckland-Shelburne Elementary School in Amherst charges $800 to $3,000 for a three-day program based on a sliding scale, according to school administrators.

"It's very hard to find a dedicated preschool that is just three mornings a week," said Valerie A. Langlois, a Lab school parent and stay-at-home mom in Belchertown. "The Lab school has been a perfect solution."

Langlois was initially drawn to the school because of its low tuition.

"We have to look...realistically at what the average parent can spend. After having experienced [the Lab school], the tuition is worth so much more than what it is."

In January and February of 2004, parents began compiling letters to advocate for the school to remain open. The letters were presented to Effrat and Chancellor John V. Lombardi.

"We got pat answers stating budget cuts," Langlois said. "It's disgusting. I think there are many more reasons why this program isn't staying around. It can't be just budget cuts. That can't be the whole truth."

Langlois is still searching for a school for her son in the fall. She feels that no matter what school she finds it will not provide the same type of attention that the Lab school staff provided.

"The [student teachers] that come into this program bring energy and enthusiasm. I think it's a bad decision on the part of the University. It doesn't speak well of the University as a part of the community. I don't think I would want to affiliate myself with UMass after this," she said.

Lombardi would not comment for the story. His secretary, Rebecca Dean, referred The Collegian to Effrat for comment.

Working with the UMass community

"The closing of the Lab school is good for the School of Nursing, but makes us feel really bad for the school," said Kathryn Fuller, an undergraduate nursing student.

Fuller, along with fellow senior nursing student Larissa Podryhula, made a demonstration to the Lab school classroom last Wednesday on germ prevention. The demonstration was a part of a community project that Fuller and Podryhula are working on.

"It's great to be able to incorporate the preschool with nursing and health," said Podryhula. "This building was designed for kids and it's too bad they can't find another."

According to Fuller and Podryhula, because the School of Nursing currently has no main building, most nursing classes are spread across the campus to utilize available space, often in trailers.

"There's no heat, no soundproofing, and no acoustics. It's not conducive to our learning," said Podryhula.

Podryhula said nursing students signed petitions to help get nursing classes out of the trailers and into a regular building — Skinner Hall. However, she says many nursing students sympathize with the preschool and have advocated for the school to remain.

"We've written letters to Dean Effrat stating that we support the preschool," said Podryhula.

Podryhula says that an ideal solution would be for the Lab school to remain in the building along with the nursing classes.

"We could use it to pediatrics and psychology [students]," she said. "It would be really great for a lot of majors just to be able to help teach and observe."

The last day of classes for the Early Childhood Lab school will be May 12.

"I know I'm going to be a wreck," said Meyer. "We usually have a pot luck lunch with all the parents and kids and teachers, and throw a party. I just don't know if I'll be able to enjoy it, knowing it's going to be the last one."

betes, reproduction, infertility, osteoporosis, thyroid disease, obesity/lipids, growth hormone, pituitary tumors and adrenal insufficiency.

Since her sophomore year, Griffin has worked with and studied Dr. Good's experiment with genetically engineered mutant mouse models called "Tubby mice."

"These animals show adult-onset obesity due to a mutation that affects the expression of a protein in their brain. We believe that in addition to body weight, this protein also regulates fertility," said Dr. Good.

"Jennifer has done several experiments to prove this theory ... and has made a number of interesting discoveries."

The Fellowship provides a $4,000 stipend, allowing Griffin to continue her participation in the "Tubby mice" study throughout the summer. The study will be the subject for her honor's thesis.

Griffin said the experiment is promising and is making great headway. The study will last through her senior year and, once completed, the results will be published in a major scientific journal.

Her extensive experience in labs gave Griffin the necessary edge to win the Endocrine Society Fellowship. Since her freshman year of college, Griffin has been involved in scientific research in two different labs at the UMass Medical School, as well as in Dr. Good's microbiology lab. She has experimented with the genetics of cancer, which she may return to in the future, and the effects of T-Cell proliferation on the Human Immunodeficiency Virus.

During this time, while maintaining a spot on the Dean's List each semester, she has won the 2002 and 2003 UMass Medical School Summer Research Fellowship, which was open to students nationwide. She was also honored with the 2002, 2003 and 2004 Honor Research Fellowship, which is awarded for students in the honors college to do research throughout the academic year.

During high school in Ushridge, Mass., Griffin planned to become a veterinarian. By her senior year, when she graduated as salutatorian, her focus had changed to human medicine by the influence of her advanced placement biology teacher, Mr. Worden.

"Mr. Worden was so knowledgeable; he inspired [his students] to learn how biology applies to and affects us," she said.

When not in the lab, Griffin works as a Resident Assistant in Greenough Hall. She also participated in this year's alternative spring break trip with the Newman Center. The group went to Ivanhoe, Va., in the Appalachian Mountains to help an impoverished town better its community.

"It was one of the most influential experiences of my life," Griffin said.

From college Griffin will go to graduate school for her PhD in immunology and virology. She has narrowed her graduate school choices to the UMass Medical School, Cornell, the Massachusetts General Hospital Program, Tufts and Brown.

Ephedra ban a responsible decision

In what may benefit the health of thousands, if not millions, a federal judge allowed a nationwide ban on dietary supplements containing ephedra to take effect yesterday.

Despite wrangling and pleas from manufacturers, the Food and Drug Administration announced in December that it was banning the sale of the amphetamine-like herb. A federal judge allowed that ban to take place yesterday.

Used for weight loss and bodybuilding, ephedra has been blamed for 155 deaths and causing injury to thousands of others. This is the first ban of a dietary supplement.

Sales of the drug had plummeted because of publicity about the risks. Baltimore Orioles pitcher Steve Bechler died a year ago because he was using ephedra. Several states (New York, Illinois and California) had banned the stimulant on their own.

This is the latest news that once again confirms what nutritionists, doctors and others in the health field have been saying for a long time: only a well-balanced diet and regular exercise can keep the body in good shape.

The news also suggests that it may be time for the FDA to analyze its own practices. Before they are allowed to be sold, medications must be proven safe and effective. However, federal law allows dietary supplements to be marketed without that kind of analysis. To prevent a supplement from hitting the market or to remove it from the market (such as in this case), the FDA must show it poses a significant health threat.

This is hardly what can be described as responsible. Although dietary supplements, in general, may be less harmful than medications, that is not a reason for the FDA to be lax about conducting studies. The way ephedra was sold treated customers like guinea pigs.

Dietary supplements, medications and other products should undergo the highest analysis to ensure the products are safe for individuals to take. Furthermore, side effects caused by the drugs should be carefully noted on the package and any problems that may be caused by having other health conditions should also be duly noted.

There is disagreement whether ephedra is indeed harmful if taken directly. But Andrew Clark, a Justice Department lawyer arguing the case for the FDA, said the ban was based on accurate data. Research shows that ephedra can speed the heart rate and constrict blood vessels. It is also particularly risky for those who have heart disease or high blood pressure or engage in a lot of exercise.

Ephedra is used to enhance one's image, after all. Even if the science is questionable, there are other ways for people to maintain a healthy body image.

It's better to be safe than sorry, and the banning of ephedra was a sound decision by U.S. District Judge Joel Pisano.

June's Catch-22

Yousef Munayyer

A conversation I imagined happening in Iraq:

Lieutenant: Mr. Bremmer, Sir, we've been intercepting an Iraqi newspaper that seems inflammatory. It claims we are not here to liberate. It says we, the Americans, are here to oppress. It says we are lying about giving people rights like freedom of religion and freedom of speech and press. Sir, what should we do about this?

Bremmer: Shut it down. Immediately.

The United States' presence in Iraq has managed to accomplish a marvelous feat: it has given the Sunni and Shiites in Iraq a common enemy. The disturbances, fighting, and demonstrations in Fallujah and Najaf show that anti-American sentiment is widely held and is not concentrated in small factions. As soccer fields continue to turn into the new graveyards of Iraq, a sight we would have imagined under Saddam, more hate develops for the American presence.

As Iraq grows to look more and more like the war zone we thought we avoided last spring, allies in Europe and other members of the coalition of the willing are having doubts about what to do. I can imagine world leaders thinking, "Should I stay or should I go now? If I go there will be trouble. If I stay there will be double." Unfortunately, that has become the reality of what has happened in Iraq.

President Bush made a major mistake when he announced the June 30 date of transition. There is no doubt this was done for domestic political reasons. No adviser who has studied the region and the scenarios could have possibly concluded that Iraq would be ready for transition by June 30. Now with that date and elections approaching one of two things can happen: First, June 30 can come and the U.S. could hand over control to the Iraqi National Congress, which is in no way prepared to handle that duty. Second, June 30 can come and the U.S. will not hand over authority which would make the president seem like he is misguided, confused and lying for political gains, again.

Hostages are being taken in waves including Americans like Thomas Hamill. When I saw the look on Hamill's face, I couldn't help but think that he really represents America's presence in Iraq. He was confused, doubtful, afraid and just seemed to look like he couldn't understand what in the world he was doing there. So many people here, praying for Mr. Hamill and all those involved, are wondering the same thing.

Our presence in Iraq is helping to Balkanize the nation to the brink of internal religious civil war.

Now, in Iraq, the United States has managed to do something it does very well: create monsters. The U.S. has managed to make Ayotolah Sistani, a man who only months ago was made out to be a trouble-making threat to stability, seem like a moderate centrist. That just shows how bad the situation has become. Now a younger cleric, Moktada al-Sadr, has crowds of followers behind him and is leading a resistance movement out of a holy site. With droves of loyal followers behind him, prepared to lead a resistance against what they may perceive as the "great Satan," he has taken over the city of Najaf.

American forces shouldn't get their hopes up if they thought they would be going home soon. As much as they and everyone else would like to see them reunited with their families, there is no way American soldiers will be leaving Iraq soon. There is too much work to be done. What is becoming clearer is that this administration knew very well that American soldiers were going to be in Iraq for a long time. The ranking members of the Senate Foreign Relations committee have said that they don't expect an Iraqi police force to be ready for another three years. There is no way the United States can pull out of Iraq unless they have someone to turn it over too.

The worst possible scenario and my greatest fear is that when the United States does eventually pull out and that common enemy is no longer present, the newly energized and zealous religious factions in Iraq will commence a slaughter that would make people wish Saddam was still in power. We are unfortunately moving closer to what seems to be this inevitable reality. Our presence in Iraq is helping to Balkanize the nation to the brink of internal religious civil war.

So is there a way out? It really does not seem like there is. There is no good outcome to this. Yet something has to be done. The president of the United States has to address the American people candidly and tell them that the June 30 date was a mistake, and that the path through Iraq will be much longer and much harder than they had been told. He has to tell the American people this and be prepared for it to cost him his presidency if he truly values the American interest. All he has to do is tell America the truth about what is the reality in Iraq. Though elections are approaching, it's time for President Bush to be honest ... better late than never.

It's fun to stay at the YMCA

Molly Eggleston

Every summer I go to a place called Sandy Island Camp. I know, I'm a little too old for summer camp, but this isn't your average summer camp. Since before I was born I've been going to the island in the middle of Lake Winnipasaukee, N.H. I hope to be able to bring my kids there when I have a family.

Yes, that's right, Sandy Island Camp is for families. Why would I, a 19 year-old college student want to go to summer camp with her parents? Because it's my favorite place to be.

Sandy Island is a summer camp run by the Boston YMCA that originally started as a camp for young men back in the early part of the 1900's. When World War II broke out, there weren't enough young men to fill a summer camp, so it became a ladies camp. Throughout the war years, young women from New England would travel to New Hampshire to attend "Sandy Camp."

When the war was over, the men came back, but the women didn't want to give up the camp they had come to love. It ran as a co-ed camp for a few years, but before long it became what it is today, a family camp.

My family has been attending Sandy Island Camp for 21 years. We're considered pretty new. Some families have been coming for over 40 or 50 years. The new families on the Island are always greeted by the experienced campers and are welcomed to the family. We have missed only one summer (when I was 8 years old) for a family trip to Europe. I enjoyed that trip, but I was very upset about missing out on seeing my friends from camp. Even by the age of 8, I had developed friendships with the other kids at Sandy. The same families come back every year; I have known these people my entire life but only see them once a year.

Sandy is like any other summer camp: there is swimming, kayaking, canoeing, tennis, volleyball, arts and crafts, off-island excursions, and a talent show at the end of each week. Picture any other summer camp, subtract the counselors, add people 18 and up, and that's Sandy.

It's the most laid back place, with the most chill people I've ever met. They even had a day camp for us when we were little that ran from breakfast until lunch. And yes, I do drink Bug Juice with every meal.

Because the entire island contains only the camp, and all campers are like a huge family, kids are allowed a great deal of independence. Usually around the age of 7, the kids outgrow the day camp and are given free roam of the island, with exception of supervised swimming. Families get to spend quality time with each other during the family style suppers every night, but still get to have as much apart time as they want.

During the day there are all the usual camp activities, but at night is when the real fun starts. Every night there is a different activity planned. There is Bingo night where you can try to win a little extra money the day before the shopping trip to Wolfboro, N.H., movie nights, and the infamous talent show. My favorite nights are the nights we have dances.

These dances don't include hip-hop or pop music, and people of every age are there. These dances are the most corny, but absolute best part of Sandy Island Camp. I'm talking about line dances.

From the tender age of 5 I have been doing the YMCA, the YaYa, the Alleycat and the Bossanova. The dances range in difficulty from the chicken dance and the bunny hop to the complicated steps of the Strawberry Patch or my favorite, the Salty Dog Rag.

Call me dork if you want, but I love those line dances. It's the only place where you'll see a 12-year-old dancing with someone else's 84-year-old grandfather, next to a 21-year-old college student dancing with a 38-year-old mother of twin 10-year-olds.

The dancing may eventually stop, but the music doesn't. There is a bonfire every night at a place on the island called Juliet's Point. During the day, it's the best view and the most romantic spot on the island, but when night falls it's where the party is. People bring their guitars or bongo drums down to the point, and the music goes on all night. The songs tend to be the old proven greats: with favorites from Bob Marley, the Greatful Dead, the Beatles and Bob Dylan being played, the jam sessions turn into sing-alongs.

When you're on the island you forget everything else exists. The cell phones are turned off, and TV's are unheard of. Even sharing a bathroom with 20 other families doesn't bother you. The walk at 3 a.m. from your family's cabin to the closest bathroom doesn't seem so long or cold or dark. Carrying flashlights is for wimps; we trip over root and rocks and logs along the path, but we make with as much as a stubbed toe.

I love Sandy Island Camp. Not just for the fun times I've had, or the great people I've gotten to love like a family, but for the amazing ability it has to unlock the free-spirited, laid back, hippie inside moody-teenagers, stressed-out stock brokers, or tired parents alike.

Next time you hear someone say they are going to family camp, don't knock the idea. It's the best time you'll have in your life.

Growing up too young

Stacy Kasdin

Since I don't have my car at college, I don't get off campus that much, and sometimes I forget that there are people in the world who are between the ages of 17 and 23. Every so often I just need to get out and get back to reality, and I decided that this past Friday was the perfect time to do that.

After merely an hour of waiting at the bus stop, I was on a jam-packed bus headed towards the Hampshire Mall. I actually managed to get a seat, and despite the man-standing-in-the-aisle's butt on my shoulder for the majority of the ride, it was fairly quick and painless. I'm pretty sure every high school and middle school student from the surrounding area had shown up for a night of fun. Combined with a good amount of five-college students and a few adults, the place was hopping.

Friday was a particularly nice day, with temperatures in the high 50s, and after the long winter we've had, everyone was savoring it. To understand my commentary on this you have to realize that until the middle of 7th grade, I never wore jeans. Ever. I refused. I only wore cotton and spandex leggings. I refused to wear skirts or dresses at all costs, or anything that showed any amount of skin. Although I've since adopted jeans as the main staple of my wardrobe, and I wear skirts occasionally, not much else has changed. I'm a huge fan of sweatshirts and have a jacket for every season plus some. In short, I often end up looking like I'm about 16 years old. I've had fourth graders ask if I was 12 and seniors ask if I was a freshman.

However, I don't think it's simply my choice of clothing that makes me look young, I think it's also what those younger than me are wearing in comparison. A girl and her friends walk past me. She's got long blonde hair, obviously straightened with a straightening iron, light brown suede knee-high boots, a skirt that in no way abides by the finger-tip rule (part of our dress code from high school: if you put your hands at your sides and your finger-tips went past the hem of the skirt, the skirt was too short), and a low-cut white top through which her bra was visible. Now if someone gave me that outfit description I'd say the wearer was probably 18-25. The girl looked like she was probably 13, maybe younger.

There's plenty of time for wearing boots in college and as adults, but the time for kickball and Play Dough is far too fleeting to waste.

But it's not just her! Her friends were wearing outfits with a similar lack of material. I suppose it's sort of hard to blame them, because lots of stores intended for adults, or at least older teens, have created chains for kids, i.e. Abercrombie, Limited Too, Rave Girl, etc. Not to mention that the girls they see in the media and idolize aren't often wearing jeans and sweatshirts. Despite all this, I've got to wonder about these kid's parents. I mean, each of them must have at least one parent, and I know my parents would have laughed the whole way home from the mall if I'd asked for knee-high suede boots at 13. I fully intend on laughing at my daughter if she asks for them at 13 as well.

If you're wearing knee-high suede boots at 13, what's the next step for turning 16? 18? Wearing nothing but thigh-high boots and underwear to the mall? I got my first pair of knee-high boots last year. I was 19. I felt special and grown-up every time I wore them; that feeling died when I saw a 12 year old with the same boots. I mean, okay, so I'm a dork, but if you do everything in your early teens, what more is there to look forward to? I'm 20 now and I still don't feel like a grown-up. I don't particularly want to. I think the thing that bothers me the most about the whole situation is really that childhood is a time I find extremely valuable, and these kids seem to be leaving it much sooner than they have to, voluntarily. I don't think they realize yet that it doesn't come back.

I don't look old, but sometimes I feel old. I know I'm not, but I still miss being a kid. I miss naptime, recess and tea parties. Those should be what childhood memories are composed of, not knee-high boots. There's plenty of time for wearing boots in college and as adults, but the time for kickball and Play Dough is far too fleeting to waste. Get out of those boots, put on your sneakers, and run around in the dirt. Jump in puddles. Swing from tree branches. Enjoy it while it lasts. You'll try to get it back when you're older, and it'll never be quite the same.

With new disc Muse finds 'Absolution'

With Limp Bizkit covering The Who's "Behind Blue Eyes" and Britney Spears gracing the cover of Rolling Stone countless times, it is safe to say that life is being sucked out of rock music. This is what makes Muse's third album, "Absolution," which went straight to No. 1 on the United Kingdom charts, all the more exciting.

Hailing from Teignmouth, England, the trio has had to fight off Radiohead comparisons since their debut, "Showbiz," dropped in 1999. Although singer Matt Bellamy's falsetto is reminiscent of a certain Thom Yorke, Muse's haunting melodies with infectious guitar riffs and chilling piano work is a blend all their own.

The album kicks off with the epic "Apocalypse Please." Pounding piano and drums give way to Bellamy's urgent cry, "Declare this an emergency, come on and spread a sense of urgency ... this is the end of the world." With no time wasted, we are heralded into the catchy single "Time is Running Out," driven by an irresistible guitar hook and leading up to the fist shaking, arena rock chorus. Next, the piano-centered "Sing for "Absolution" allows us to catch our breath before being floored by the gripping and intense "Stockholm Syndrome." This song may be the heaviest Muse has recorded to date, practically begging exhilarated fans to shout along. "This is the last time I'll forget you, I wish I could."

Whereas on Showbiz and 2002's "Origin of Symmetry" Muse used keyboards to fill out songs and add texture, "Absolution" dabbles with strings. The result is "Blackout," where Bellamy's desperate vocals are laced with strings, and the experimental "Butterflies and Hurricanes," which successfully blends strings with heavy guitar work, keeping the song hard hitting and powerful.

"Absolution" is not a surprising release from Muse, but another step in their constant evolution. There may be a couple snoozers on the album (such as "Endlessly," which features loopy keyboard and bliss that drones on forever), but for the most part, "Absolution" is a refreshing rock record. It displays Muse's gift for song writing and proves that they are one of the few bands able to throw a piano and keyboard into the mix and still rock hard.

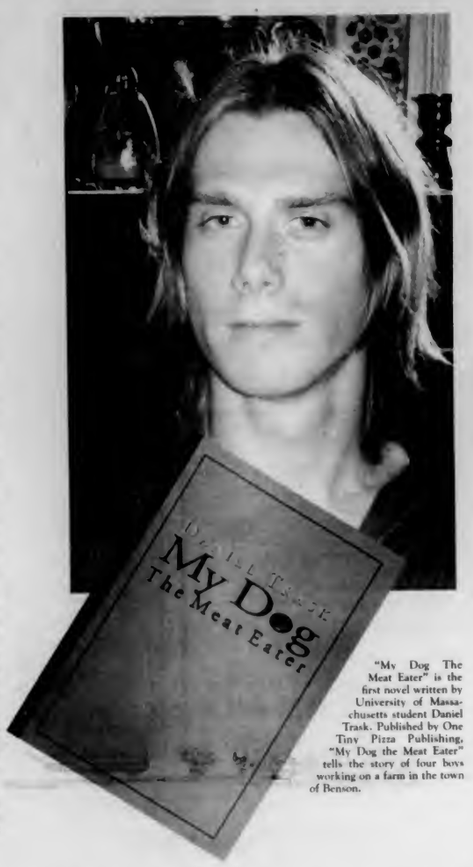
UMass student triumphs with debut novel

By Amy Forni
Collegian Correspondent

Find a few spare hours and get comfortable because once you begin reading "My Dog The Meat Eater" by Daniel Trask you will develop a connection with the characters and themes. The experimental novel appeals to open minded readers by exploring several ideas and points of view.

"My Dog The Meat Eater" incorporates autobiographical accounts of daily life transcended in the direction of the fantastic. The novel intertwines multilayered themes including life and death, the deep connection and dependence that develop between people and animals, as well as people and land. The book explores the silent yet unbreakable connection between friends who share a common bond and love. Evident themes also discuss the impact of industrialization on the cultivation and necessity of farming and the hardships of growing up and the unstoppable time clock of our lives.

Yanni, Enridgio, Bag, and Bear devote their summers to maintaining the last existing farm in the town of Benson. Working alongside them, an old Puerto Rican named Louie entertains them with his broken English and enthusiasm for bringing life to the land. The boys grow together each summer and eventually pave their own paths. However, they always remember the farm. The stretch of fields they labored over continually run through their hearts.



Trask's poetic style and intense imagery open up an infinite domain of interpretation. The book incorporates the sometimes unspoken realities of life and succeeds in developing an emotional appeal to the readers. Trask commented that he "did not want to control what readers took from the book."

Trask's freestyle writing exercises the use of different tenses ranging from first to third person. The voices of dogs, mice and in dreams present different points of view. The speech style changes for each character proving their uniqueness and individual presence in the story.

The poetic and creative language, images, and human feelings float off the pages and into readers' hearts. "My Dog The Meat Eater" leaves readers in contemplation by questioning their own relationships and existences in our world today.

"My Dog The Meat Eater" is Trask's first published novel. As an undergraduate biology major at the University of Massachusetts, Trask spent nine months composing the 132-page book. He commented that the book wrote itself and "told [him] what direction to go in." He writes short stories inspired by his experiences, dreams, and relationships.

The book is available for $11.99 at the Campus Center Store, Food for Thought in Amherst and Broad Side Book Shop in Northampton. You can visit Trask's website at www.otppub.com to learn more about the author as well as read reviews from other readers.

"My Dog The Meat Eater" is the first novel written by University of Massachusetts student Daniel Trask. Published by One Tiny Pizza Publishing, "My Dog the Meat Eater" tells the story of four boys working on a farm in the town of Benson.

Spring Concert acts announced

Busta Rhymes and Jurassic 5 to play Mullins Center

It's official. Busta Rhymes will make his way to the Pioneer Valley this spring.

An e-mail from University Productions and Concerts sent to the Massachusetts Daily Collegian yesterday, confirmed the rumors that Rhymes will be taking over the stage of the Mullins Center at this year's Spring Concert, along with hip-hop powerhouse Jurassic 5. The concert will mark Busta's ascension into the ranks of UMass Spring Concert performers.

Rhymes, who has made recent headlines thanks to assault charges filed on him by a Providence, R.I. woman, will headline the May 2 concert. The rapper recently received six months probation for the assault of a concertgoer in Fall River in December 2002, to which he pleaded no contest. The charges alleged that Celine Giguere reached out and touched the performer during his show and he then slammed her head into a table. In a statement Rhymes read in court, the Flip Mode Squad leader claimed he only asked her to make sure she didn't touch him again. Rhymes has also filed assault charges, against Giguere.

Despite the negative press, Busta seems to be doing alright for himself. He will also be headlining at Harvard University's version of the Spring Concert, Springfest, in the weeks before his UMass appearance, stopping at Cambridge on April 23. According to the April 5 Harvard Crimson, "Busta Rhymes has accepted Harvard's $40,000 bid to perform at this year's Springfest."

Joining Busta Rhymes at Mullins will be Los Angeles-based hip-hoppers Jurassic 5. In their 11 years making music, Jurassic 5 have earned a place alongside the likes of The Roots, Mos Def and Talib Kweli in the hip-hop scene. As their second full-length album, "Power in Numbers," gains momentum, Jurassic 5 have gained notoriety. Amherst is not the only college stop on the group's current touring schedule; Jurassic 5 are also slated to play Providence's Brown University before hitting the Mullins, as well as shows at the University of Montana and the University of Missouri after UMass' Spring Concert.

The Spring Concert will be May 2 at the Mullins Center. Tickets are free for UMass students with a valid student ID.

Fluffy teen flick 'The Girl Next Door' takes on adult films

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

"The Girl Next Door," a modestly appealing teen sex comedy about boy and his porn star, has something that most smutty films don't: a genuinely sweet romantic spirit. It's a movie set in the glittering raunch paradise known as the adult film industry, yet it isn't gross or crude or dirty or any of the other dozen derisive names that could typically be applied to this kind of pandering trash.

What it does have is a winning cuteness — a cuteness that helps balance out the movie's inherent confusion. Here's a film that wants to have its adult film star and sleep with her too (to paraphrase on old saying.) "The Girl Next Door" doesn't know whether or not it wants the moral upperhand against sex cinema or revel in the genre's unabashed naughtiness; naturally, it tries for both at the same time. The movie would have been better — sharper, braver, smarter — had it had the guts to take a real stake in either position: a righteous cry of rage, shame and indignation against exploitation, or a randy, subversive bit of winking naughtiness.

Elisha Cuthbert stars in Fox's "The Girl Next Door" as Danielle, the sweet and spontaneous adult film star that moves into town.

Grade B-

The movie works on its basic level as a boy-meets-girl love story. The boy is Matthew (Emile Hirsch), a straight-arrow senior class president (he's been accepted into George-town) who looks longingly on the carefree cool kids who regularly skip their classes; he secretly wishes he had the guts to cut loose and do something wild and memorable (even the math geeks crafted fake IDs.) The girl is the new blonde babe next door, Danielle, who has the tawny, lithe (and slightly bland) good looks of a Maxim cover model — which is no surprise, considering that Elisha Cuthbert, the "24" actress who plays her, did some time on the covers of those men's magazines.

Danielle catches Matt spying on her through their bedroom windows, and she uses it as the occasion to pull a practical joke on him. After that, it's love. Hirsch is just handsome enough, and he imbues Matt with enough anxious maturity and shy charm, to be believable as a romantic mate for this fantasy gal, while Cuthbert starts off by playing Danielle with a charming combination of vulnerability and vivacity — he digs her spontaneity while she falls for his heartfelt affection.

Matt's friend Eli (a funny and energetic Christopher Marquette) clues his buddy onto the awful truth: Danielle's really a porn star. In this movie, she's a porn star with a heart of gold — a nice girl gone "bad" who wants to be good again — and the more the movie contorts itself to the demands of the plot the less Cuthbert is given to do; she goes from winning romantic foil to lovely prop.

Matt's reaction to the news repels Danielle; he, of course, risks everything — his future, his life — to win her back and draw her away from the exploitative world she has known.

"The Girl Next Door" isn't a very funny movie — the laughs seem to dissipate from time to time — but it is a likable one. It helps that Hirsch and Cuthbert have such an appealing chemistry. It also helps that the leads have such a superb undercast helping them. Timothy Olyphant, sporting a seriously spiked hairdo and snakeskin jacket, plays Danielle's ex-boyfriend/producer with a mixture of creepy sleaziness, erotic confidence and casual menace; Olyphant plays his role with an obvious relish.

The movie revolves to a wishy-washy conclusion, which I won't reveal, except to say that it fails to resolve the movie's waffling stance. But for all its confusion, "The Girl Next Door" emerges as a surprisingly watchable romantic comedy. How many teen sex comedies can say that?

Emile Hirsch (top) gives an impressive performance as straight-laced Matthew. The chemistry between Cuthbert and Hirsch isn't enough to save "The Girl Next Door" from its wishy-washy plot.

Another milestone for Bonds

life."

Mays has been a mentor to Bonds since the slugger's father, Bobby, died last August.

Hank Aaron leads the career list with 755 home runs, followed by Babe Ruth with 714.

Mays hit his 660th on Aug. 17, 1973, as a member of the New York Mets at Shea Stadium off Cincinnati's Don Gullett.

"I don't even recall that. That's many years ago," said Mays, who preferred to focus on Bonds' accomplishment. "I wanted him to get it over with. No. 1, I felt like he was pressing. When Barry swings hard, nothing happens. Today, he made an easy, compact swing and it goes a long way."

Bonds, who set the single-season homer record in 2001, went five games without a homer after hitting one last Monday at Houston.

"Maybe I'm just too stupid to walk him every time," Brewers manager Ned Yost said. "I'd venture to say there's not another player on this planet better than Barry Bonds."

Bonds has repeatedly said he'd like to pass Mays at home, and the Giants began a 10-game homestand with a three-game series against the Brewers.

When Kinney saw Bonds' ball go over the fence, the pitcher walked backward off the mound and onto the grass, trying to ignore the slugger's historic home-run trot.

"When I saw him swing I knew it wasn't a good thing," Kinney said.

Bonds walked on four pitches in the first, then singled in the third. Bonds took three straight balls in the fifth — and Kinney was booed loudly on each — then fouled a pitch off before hitting the extra-special shot.

Nationwide ban on Ephedra allowed after numerous deaths

NEWARK, N.J. — A federal judge allowed a nationwide ban on dietary supplements containing ephedra to take effect Monday, turning aside a plea from two manufacturers.

Ephedra, once hugely popular for weight loss and bodybuilding, has been linked to 155 deaths, including that of Baltimore Orioles pitcher Steve Bechler a year ago.

U.S. District Judge Joel Pisano refused to grant a temporary restraining order that would have prevented the Food and Drug Administration from banning the products.

After years of fighting manufacturers over the risks, the FDA announced in December that it was banning the sale of the amphetamine-like herb — the first such ban of a dietary supplement.

"These products pose unacceptable health risks, and any consumers who are still using them should stop immediately," Health and Human Services Secretary Tommy G. Thompson said.

NVE Pharmaceuticals of Newton, manufacturer of the diet supplement Stacker 2, had hoped to head off the ban, arguing its product is safe if used as directed. It was joined by a second company, the National Institute for Clinical Weight Loss, manufacturer of a product called Thermalean.

The judge said the manufacturers did not meet several legal requirements, including proving that they are likely to win the case and that they would suffer irreparable harm if the ban took effect.

Pisano's ruling means the ban will be in effect at least until NVE's lawsuit can be heard. No trial date has been set.

Ephedra sales already had plummeted because of publicity about the risks, especially after Bechler's death a year ago. Three states — New York, Illinois and California — prohibited the stimulant on their own.

"Ephedra has killed more than 100 individuals and injured thousands of others," said Bruce Silverglade, legal director of the Washington-based Center for Science in the Public Interest. "The only problem is, it took the FDA almost 10 years to ban the substance."

Unlike medications, which must be proven safe and effective before they are allowed to be sold, federal law allows dietary supplements to be marketed without any such proof. To curb a supplement, the FDA must show it poses a significant health threat.

NVE maintains that the FDA failed to prove such a threat if the supplement is taken correctly, and was swayed by the outcry over ephedra deaths.

Women's tennis drops Quinnipiac

By Leah Wyner
Collegian Staff

After a tentative start in yesterday's match against Quinnipiac, the Massachusetts tennis team bounced back to win 4-3.

Winning the doubles point just wasn't in the cards for the Minutewomen. Bobcats Kim Piazza and Gabby Pasternak took their head start in the No. 1 doubles match, defeating Minutewomen Stephanie Price and Jafra Depontes 8-3. Next was No. 2 doubles team of Christine Liehr and Dorothy Iwaniwicz, who didn't fare much better in their match, and were defeated by Danielle Rautenberg and Tina Hoang. Sasha Edelstein and Susan Hyams garnered the team's first win at the No. 3 position against Liz Axler and Kat Ehle (8-3), but the team had already lost the doubles point.

Price was up next for the team in No. 1 singles, but fell in her first set with a score of 6-1.

"I was struggling at first because I didn't have a lot of confidence, and then I got some good words of wisdom from [head] coach [Judy Dixon], who made me believe in myself," Price said.

Sure enough, things started to look up for Price, who pulled off a win in her second set, 1-6. She lost her match in the third set 7-5, but not without a fight.

"I fought it out in a long, hard, match," Price said.

In No. 2 singles, Liehr was in a fight of her own. The first set went to Quinnipiac, 6-2, but the second set was close, with Liehr prevailing in the end, 6-7. She lost the third set 6-1, but the Minutewomen were gaining momentum.

"Although we started out flat and tentative, we began turning it around," Dixon said.

The real turning point was the No. 3 and 4 singles matches. Edelstein overpowered powerhouse Rautenberg in No. 3 singles with a score of 6-4, 6-2, and No. 4 Depontes went out with a bang, delivering another win for the Minutewomen in the final home match of her collegiate career (1-6, 7-5, 6-2).

"It was a huge win for Sasha, she defeated the emotional center of the Quinnipiac team," Dixon said. "Jafra had a very good win. She lost the first set, but then she started slowly turning her match around."

Ivanowicz followed suit, winning the No. 5 singles 7-6, 6-1, and Hyams ended her last home meet on an excellent note as well, triumphing in the No. 6 spot with a score of 6-3, 6-1.

The team travels to Boston University today, and this weekend holds the much anticipated Atlantic 10 Championships, where for the first time, several teams could likely walk away with the championship trophy.

Minutewomen overpower Terriers

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

On a cold, windy day in Boston, the Massachusetts softball team fought through the conditions, nullifying a pair of Boston University comebacks en route to an 11-6 downing of the host Terriers.

With the win, the Minutewomen (19-11) have now won 12 in a row, dating back to March 13. For the Terriers (15-22), their three-game losing streak came to an end.

UMass	11
BU	6

Junior shortstop Hilary Puglia's three-run double in the second inning pushed the Minutewomen out to a comfortable 5-0 lead before she struck again later in the game with a fourth-inning solo shot over centerfield. Senior outfielder KC Budziewicz played some long ball as well, with a leadoff solo shot to right in the top of the seventh.

"They've both gotten into a very good rhythm at the plate," coach Elaine Sortino said of the two. "Although KC had a home run today, I thought her best at-bat came when she bunted down the foul line to advance the runners. She's got a good eye, and has been outstanding."

The Minutewomen and Terriers both had their troubles on the mound, and with the wind blowing outward to centerfield, the hitters were swinging for the fences.

Both pitching staffs surrendered two homers on the day.

"They struggled, it was a tough day," Sortino said. "They threw a lot of balls on the plate ... it was tough with the wind blowing straight at them. I think they did a relatively good job, given what they had to work with, with the wind and cold."

The Terriers' two homers came from their two most productive players on the day. Sophomore first baseman Liz Alley was three for four on the day, homering to center in the third; freshman second baseman Chiya Louie was two for four on the day, her seventh-inning two-run shot to center coming at a time too late for the Terriers to bounce back.

The Maroon and White struck early in the first, when sophomore third baseman KJ Kelley's sacrifice fly to center brought home Puglia from third. Freshman outfielder Candice Molinari was soon to follow, coming home on a Jamie Cahalan fielder's choice to make it 2-0 after one.

After Puglia's bases-clearing double off Brittany Detwiler, it was a 5-0 affair, the momentum on UMass' side. But the Terriers fought back in the bottom of the third to halt things for the time being. Detwiler exited the game after the inning, replaced by freshman Ashlee Freeman.

Alley hit a crucial two-run blooper to right-center to make it 5-2, but Puglia's solo shot to center just half an inning later pushed the lead to four.

The Terriers creeped up on UMass yet again in the bottom of the fourth, scoring two more runs to close the gap even further. An RBI double down the left field line from sophomore designated player Erin McDonald would score Louie, and a bases-loaded walk.

BU only chance to take the lead was squandered by the ace pitching of Kelli Arnold. With the bases loaded, Arnold quietly retired the side. Louie lined into a double play, and Arnold struck out a looking Detwiler to end the inning.

The Minutewomen added three more runs in the top of the sixth thanks to a passed ball, a fielding error, and a Cahalan double. They would never look back, scoring two more in the seventh before the Terriers returned that favor with two of their own to end the game.

One of the great finishes

By Doug Ferguson

AUGUSTA, Ga. (AP) — The short trip down Magnolia Lane ends with a circular drive in front of the Augusta National clubhouse, and that's where it all might finally sink in for Phil Mickelson.

Only the Masters champions are allowed upstairs in their private locker room. Everyone else enters through a side door on the ground level.

Suddenly, Mickelson's career is looking up.

Despite winning 22 times on the PGA Tour and routinely dazzling galleries with shots most guys can't even picture, Mickelson's record always carried an asterisk, if not a label: best player to never win a major.

Now, Mickelson is one of the best players, period.

All it took was a back nine Sunday that ranks among the best performances in the 68-year history of the Masters. He birdied five of the last seven holes, including an 18-foot putt on No. 18 for a one-shot victory over Ernie Els. It was only the fourth walkoff birdie to win a green jacket, and it was the most dramatic of them all.

This was John Elway finally winning the Super Bowl.

It was Dale Earnhardt winning the Daytona 500.

"Having come so close so many times ... to have it be such a difficult journey to win my first major makes it that much more special, sweeter," Mickelson said. "And it just feels awesome."

Mickelson did not have the toughest or the longest road to his first major championship.

Tom Kite was a 16-time winner with two PGA Tour money titles. He had the 54-hole lead at the '84 Masters and the '89 U.S. Open and collapsed both times, with final rounds of 75 and 78. He finally ended his 0-for-67 streak in the majors by winning at Pebble Beach in the '92 U.S. Open.

Mark O'Meara had 14 titles and was 0-for-56 in the majors until he won the '98 Masters, then added the British Open at Royal Birkdale later that summer.

That became the pinnacle of their careers. Kite was 42, O'Meara was 41.

Mickelson turns 34 in June, approaching the prime of his career.

When he lost the 2001 PGA Championship in Atlanta by one shot to David Toms, the frustration was starting to show. Mickelson said he didn't want to win one major, but a bunch of them.

Draped in a size 43-long green jacket, still trying to sort through the raw joy of winning his first major, Mickelson wasn't ready to look too far ahead.

"Well, one isn't really a bunch, but it's a nice start," he said. "I hope it does lead to more, but right now I just want to cherish this one."

Tiger Woods already has eight majors, winning his first at age 21.

Els, who shot 67 and looked like the next Masters champion for the longest time Sunday, won the first of his three majors at 24.

Mickelson still has some ground to make up.

Then again, Ben Hogan was 34 when he won his first major at the 1946 PGA Championship. Despite a car accident that nearly took his life, Hogan won nine majors and was more dominant than any other professional in the majors by winning six out of eight during one stretch.

Phil Mickelson celebrates after winning the Masters golf tournament.

There are other similarities worth noting between Hogan and Mickelson.

Hogan realized he could never win majors, or become a great player, until he learned how to eliminate the hook. Mickelson, who had a lust for length off the tee, changed this year from a power draw to a controlled fade, and it paid enormous dividends at the Masters.

He was ninth-best in driving accuracy. No. 1 in greens in regulation.

"When I stood up on tee boxes, I just knew the ball was going to go in the middle of the fairway," he said.

Heat ousts Celtics as playoff implications rise

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Four teams were interested in the outcome of Monday night's game between Miami and Boston. The Celtics weren't one of them.

The Heat defeated Boston 84-77, getting 28 points and 11 rebounds from Lamar Odom to retain a chance to open the playoffs at home. The game helped sort out the Eastern Conference playoff race between Miami, Milwaukee, New Orleans and the Knicks, but it meant nothing to the Celtics.

Boston, with a losing streak that has now stretched to five games, rested Paul Pierce a day after backing into the playoffs.

"We just have to play well when we get into the playoffs," Celtics forward Walter McCarty said. "What's done before the playoffs doesn't count in the playoffs. Whether we backed in or got in, we're in."

Miami improved to 41-40 and moved into a tie with the Bucks for fourth place in the East. Each has one game remaining, and Milwaukee holds the tiebreaker.

"It's nice to be playing for that," said Miami coach Stan Van Gundy, who took over the team right before the season started and saw them lose their first seven games. "It feels great to know we can't finish below .500. It's a great accomplishment."

With New Orleans losing to New York, the Heat can finish no lower than fifth.

"We had some different agendas," Boston coach John Carroll said. "I wouldn't use 'beauty.' I wouldn't use 'artistic.' Not the words I would use. ... If we had played our starting group heavy minutes, and if Paul had played, it might have been slightly different."

With Pierce resting a sore right ankle, Ricky Davis scored 25 and Mark Blount had 10 points and nine rebounds. Boston will enter the playoffs despite finishing the regular season at least 10 games below .500; The worst record for a playoff team was the 1967-68 Chicago Bulls, who finished fourth in the West at 29-53.

Reserve Udonis Haslem had 11 rebounds for the Heat.

"We're right in the position we want to be in," Odom said.

An early glance at Major League Baseball

MLB Preview

AL East

1. New York — The Yankees loaded up again this off-season with the additions of Javier Vazquez Gary Sheffield, Kevin Brown, and of course A-Rod. The Yanks lost three starting pitchers from last year, and Mike Mussina has gotten off to a shaky start, but the offense should carry the team to its seventh consecutive AL East division title.

2. Boston — Tough first month against AL East foes, but if they come out of April in fact, they'll be in good shape as they should get Nomar Garciaparra and Trot Nixon back in May. This is the most depth the pitching staff has had in years. Pedro Martinez may be the "ace" but look for Curt Schilling, who will win this year's Cy Young, to get the ball in Game 1 of the playoff series after the Sox capture their second straight Wild Card.

3. Toronto — The Jays added Miguel Batista, Ted Lilly, and Pat Hentgen to their staff to complement an already fearsome offense. They won't have enough firepower to overtake the Yanks or Sox this year, but if the Sox lose some of their potential free agents next off-season, the Jays will be ready to contend next year.

4. Baltimore — This team is a slightly better version of the recent Texas Rangers slugging squads. There aren't many holes in the lineup, but there are huge gaps in the starting rotation.

5. Tampa Bay — This will be the best last-place team in baseball. Lou Piniella is starting to build a competitive team from nothing, but unfortunately for Lou, the D-Rays are stuck in the loaded East.

AL Central

1. Minnesota — The Twins will take home their third consecutive division crown due to their balanced offense and solid pitching. Minnesota didn't make any major moves this off-season but rookie catcher Joe Mauer is being hyped as a future superstar. Twins will have to wait a month to see what Mauer can do as he recently tore cartilage in his knee.

2. Kansas City — KC won't be able to sneak up on teams like they did last year, but with a stacked offense they won't need to. In wide-open Central, the Royals should compete for a playoff spot, and Carlos Beltran will become a household name in the process, but they will fall short of the Twins in the pitching department.

3. Chicago — The Sox rotation is still good, despite the loss of Bartolo Colon in the off-season. Esteban Loaiza must prove last year's performance was not a fluke if this team is to contend. The offense has the potential to be deadly, but if this team gets off to a slow start expect Magglio Ordoñez to be on the trading block, as GM Kenn Williams has a penchant for big deadline moves.

4. Detroit — The Tigers actually had a busy off-season, signing Ivan Rodriguez, Ugueth Urbina, Fernando Viña, Rondell White, and Carlos Guillen, and the only direction for them to go from last year's dreadful season is up. Expect Detroit to make strides this year, especially the young rotation which took such a pounding last year, and look for them to climb out of the division cellar.

5. Cleveland — Many people are touting the Tribe as a team on the verge of being a strong contender. While they may be a formidable squad in 2005, this young team is definitely a year away, and 2004 will be a pivotal year in the rebuilding process.

AL West

1. Anaheim — Somehow the Angels off-season acquisitions of Vlad Guerrero, Jose Guillen, and Bartolo Colon managed to slide under-the-radar. Guerrero and Garret Anderson are as good as it gets in the middle of a lineup, and look for Anderson to benefit from Vlad's presence in the lineup and take home the MVP trophy this year. The Angels should be ready to return to the playoffs after last year's World Series hangover.

2. Oakland — The A's can never be counted out so long as they keep sending three of the best pitchers in the game to the mound every year. This team is always dangerous but the lineup is so weak this year that Oakland won't have the opportunity to blow yet another 2-0 series lead in the postseason.

3. Seattle — The Mariners just missed out on last year's playoffs and figure to miss out again this year because it is becoming apparent that Freddy Garcia is never going to blossom into the ace many predicted he would become.

4. Texas — It's the same story every year for the Rangers: the offense will be one of the best in the league and the pitching staff will be one of the worst in the league. No different this year.

NL East

1. Philadelphia — The addition of Billy Wagner will be huge for this team, as last season's closer Jose Mesa walked a tightrope every ninth inning. If Pat Burrell can rebound from a down year this team might live up to the World Series expectations many have cast upon them.

2. Florida — The Fish didn't dismantle their championship team like they did the first time around, but their offense did lose some of its clout with the loss of Pudge Rodriguez and the trade of Derrek Lee. The Marlins starters are easily the best collection of young guns in the game, and Josh Beckett will be looking to take the step to become a bona fide ace this year.

3. Atlanta — They've been counted out before, but this year will finally be the end of their amazing streak of nine consecutive division titles. That one World Series title in the Maddux, Glavine, and Smoltz era has to be disappointing, but manager Bobby Cox deserves high praise for leading the Braves to successful seasons year in and year out.

4. New York — Embarrassing output from the Mets last year, but the team made efforts to solidify their woeful defense. Additions of Kaz Matsui and Mike Cameron up the middle significantly improve the team and a third consecutive last place finish would be inexcusable considering the club's huge payroll.

5. Montreal — This annually overachieving club will be hard-pressed to compete this year. Losing ace Javier Vazquez and the irreplaceable Vlad Guerrero will be too much to overcome for the Expos.

NL Central

1. Chicago — The Cubbies have been branded World Series favorites by many, a tall order for a team that hasn't even been to the Series since 1945. The North Side squad made all the right moves this off-season, signing Greg Maddux, LaTroy Hawkins, Todd Walker, and trading for Derrek Lee. Corey Patterson is back from injury and is poised for a breakout season.

2. Houston — The Astros scored big with the Andy Pettitte signing and even bigger when Pettitte convinced his buddy Roger Clemens to join him in Houston. Houston and Chicago should battle it out in the NL's toughest pennant race, with Houston coming in second, but capturing the Wild Card.

3. St. Louis — The Cardinals are in the same position as the Mariners. St. Louis is a very good team, but stuck behind two teams a notch better than them. If the Cards play up to their potential this could very well turn into a three-team race in the Central. If nothing else, Cards fans get to watch Albert Pujols, who should take home the MVP award.

4. Cincinnati — The Reds are best of a sorry bunch of teams that are far below the top three teams in the Central. It will be interesting to see if Griffey regains some of his old form if there will be any suitors at the trade deadline.

5. Milwaukee — Is there ever really anything notable to say about the Brewers? This team shows no signs of moving from the bottom of the division.

6. Pittsburgh — Unlike the Brewers, the Pirates at least appear to be trying to build towards contention. The only problem for the Bucs is that despite decent pitching, they may be in store for a season comparable to last year's Tigers campaign due to a powerless offense.

NL West

1. San Francisco — This prediction is contingent on teams actually pitching to Bonds. But if the surly one sees anything to hit this year, he should come close to passing Babe Ruth's home run total. Staff ace Jason Schmidt will shoulder a big load for the team and will rise to the challenge, garnering the Cy Young award.

2. Arizona — The trade for Richie Sexson will be big for the Diamondbacks, whose offense has been a liability in the past. The big question marks are whether Randy Johnson can return to his old dominant self after injury and if Brandon Webb can step in and fill the void left by Curt Schilling.

3. San Diego — The Padres may sneak up on some teams this year and could be a factor in the West race, but they don't have enough offensive weapons or pitching depth to be a serious contender this year.

4. Los Angeles — The biggest problem for the Dodgers last year was their atrocious offense. To fill this hole they went out into a free agent market full of sluggers and netted only Juan Encarnacion. Not exactly the big splash fans in L.A. were hoping for.

5. Colorado — It's a shame that Todd Helton's skills are being wasted on a team that never has a chance, but by now it should be clear that it is simply impossible to compete while playing in the thin air of Coors Field.

San Francisco Giants' Barry Bonds raises his arms after he hit a three run home run to tie godfather Willie Mays for third on baseball's career list against the Milwaukee Brewers in San Francisco yesterday.

Bonds matches Mays for third

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Barry Bonds has sought Willie Mays' approval ever since he was old enough to tag along with his godfather in the San Francisco Giants' clubhouse. Six MVPs, a single-season record 73 home runs, and countless other accomplishments never felt like quite enough.

Hitting his 660th homer to tie Mays for third place on the career list has done the trick.

Bonds hit a towering three-run shot Monday that splashed into McCovey Cove, sending the Giants to a 7-5 win over the Milwaukee Brewers.

"It was like a weight was just lifted off my shoulders," Bonds said. "I felt a sense of accomplishment in baseball. It's a relief now to be able to stand next to my godfather and finally feel like I've accomplished something in the game of baseball. It was a big way of getting his approval that I've finally done something."

Bonds connected in the fifth inning on a 3-1 pitch from Matt Kinney (0-1) for his second homer of the season. The estimated 442-foot blast put the Giants ahead 5-4. It was the 28th time Bonds has homered into the water.

The 39-year-old Bonds was greeted at home by several teammates and he stepped on the plate, raised both hands in the air and pointed to the sky.

Mays, who turns 73 next month, hurried to congratulate Bonds, giving his godson a hug and a kiss outside the dugout. Mays presented him with a torch decorated with 25 tiny diamonds, symbolic of the number Bonds wears. They both carried the torch before the 2002 Olympics.

Bonds came back out of the dugout and waved to the fans in each direction as they cheered, "Barry! Barry!" and gave him a standing ovation. The sellout crowd of 42,548 seemed to forget about the steroid controversy surrounding their star slugger and his personal trainer.

"The fans appreciate a good baseball player," manager Felipe Alou said. "I know some guys were booing, but they love the guy."

Children along the left-field wall bowed to Bonds when he came out to play the field in the top of the sixth. A banner of Bonds was unfurled from the light tower to the left side of the main center-field scoreboard to match one of Mays on the other side.

"I think this is probably the icing on the cake," Bonds said. "I really wish my dad could have been here to be part of it. ... I just really can't believe it, being 4 years old when my dad came up into the major leagues and having an idol like Willie Mays take me under his wing, and now being up in front of all of you people answering questions what it's like to tie the man you respected and honored your entire

Minutewomen bit by Spiders

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team had a great opportunity to put a stranglehold on the Atlantic 10 this weekend during their two-game road trip against conference opponents.

UMass	7
Richmond	19

The Minutewomen (2-8, 1-2 A-10) had a chance to improve their Atlantic 10 record to 3-0 with two wins, but when Sunday evening came around, they were heading back to Amherst with two more losses.

UMass was blown out by Richmond (6-6, 2-1 A-10) by a score of 19-7 on Friday, and dropped its fifth one-goal game of the season to George Washington (7-5, 3-0 A-10) on Sunday, 11-10.

Friday's contest against the Spiders wasn't close at any point of the game. Richmond came out of the gates on fire and scored the first eight goals of the contest in less than 15 minutes.

Richmond's Polly Purcell and Kristen Habicht each had hat tricks before UMass was able to get on the board.

The Minutewomen's leading point-scorer, Tracey Drown, knew exactly why Richmond played its best game of the season.

"We beat them last season (in the Atlantic 10 semifinals). We were down seven goals with six minutes left. We tied it and then won in overtime," Drown said.

Drown acknowledged that Richmond just wanted this game more than UMass did.

"They wanted to kill us. They had revenge in mind. They knew everything we were going to do," said Drown, who led the Minutewomen with two goals and an assist in the game.

Richmond's scoring attack was led by Purcell and Libby Berlacher with six goals each and a five-goal performance from Habicht. Allison Nuzzi contributed with five assists.

UMass had a chance to salvage one win out of the weekend in Washington D.C. on Sunday against George Washington, but they fell apart in the second half.

Hope Zelinger scored her third goal of the game with just over 16 minutes to play in the second half to put UMass up 10-7, but that was the last goal the Minutewomen would score.

The Colonials scored four goals in the game's final eight minutes to lock up their victory. Five-time Atlantic 10 Conference Rookie of the Week Laura Hostetler scored three of those goals including the game-winner. She led George Washington with four goals and two assists in the game.

Six of UMass' eight losses this season have come by a combined total of seven goals, and second half letdowns have really destroyed what could have been a great start for the talented team.

"We need to learn how to handle the pressure (of playing in a close game). We have a somewhat lack of experience. We need to play together from the beginning all the way to the end," said Drown, who scored two goals in the game.

The Minutewomen have four Atlantic 10 games remaining on their schedule, so they still have time to put a string of wins together in order to qualify for the A-10 tournament.

"We need to forget about everything we have or haven't done. Our team is so talented. It's so frustrating. Sunday (against Temple) is a do or die game," Drown said.

Minutemen get mixed production against Atlantic 10 rival Dayton

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

After weeks of postponed games and limited time on the diamond, it appears that the rain has caused the gears of the Massachusetts baseball team to rust.

Last weekend the Minutemen traveled to Ohio to take on Atlantic 10 conference rival Dayton in a three-game series. UMass went 1-for-3 on the weekend, winning the first game of the series 7-2, while dropping the others 5-4 and 5-1 respectively.

In Sunday's 5-1 loss, Dayton pitcher Luke Trubee pitched seven innings and recorded three strikeouts on the afternoon. The Minutemen were able to scatter nine hits on Trubee, but couldn't capitalize, stranding eight batters during the contest.

Mike Crane was on the mound for UMass and gave up four runs over six innings. The game was Crane's sixth appearance of the season over which he has gone 0-3 with a 7.71 ERA.

One bright spot for the Minutemen was the play of freshman Frank Curreri, who had three hits and the game's lone RBI when he sent Jason Twomley home in the sixth inning.

Curreri had an offensively productive weekend as he had seven RBIs, seven hits, one run, and a home run, his second of the season.

Sunday marked the second time this season that the Minutemen were held to one run. Both times UMass was facing off against A-10 foes, with its first coming against George Washington March 27.

In the second game of the series, the Flyers were behind the eight ball at the start as the Minutemen jumped out to a 2-0 lead in the first Inning. The advantage was short-lived as Dayton put together a four run third inning against starter Matt Torra.

Torra made it to the sixth inning, striking out five, while giving up all five runs for the game. Junior reliever Keith Doherty came in and shut Dayton out. Doherty has pitched a total of six innings this year and has yet to give up a run.

UMass was able to muster another two runs in the game (one in the third and one in the fourth), but the Flyers ended up the victors of the shootout.

In the Minutmen's lone win of the series starter Eric Chown exhibited why he is the ace of the squad. Chown had six shutout innings and only gave up two runs, both in the first. The win gave Chown a 3-2 record on the year and a 3.72 ERA, the lowest among UMass starters.

UMass kept the game within the grasps of the Flyers, as it was only able to muster three runs over the first six Innings. In the seventh inning, the Minutemen exploded for four runs, putting the game out of reach.

The Minutemen have a home-and-home series against UConn this week, starting tomorrow at 3 p.m. at Earl Lorden Field. UConn is the last non-conference team UMass will meet before it takes on the bulk of its A-10 schedule.

Student raises funds for youth in Bulgaria

With determination, University of Massachusetts student Denitza Stantcheva has been collecting money for underprivileged children in Third World countries.

A sophomore English major, Stantcheva has set up a table in the Campus Center every day since April 6, asking for donations for KEMS, or the Kids Emergency Medical Services, which assists children in underdeveloped countries in need of medical attention.

Stantcheva is currently raising money for a three-year-old girl who lives in Bulgaria and needs a rare and expensive type of eye surgery. The young girl was born with a rare eye disease that required her to wear heavy contact prescriptions. The condition has become so bad that her life is in jeopardy if she does not receive the medical attention. The surgery, which consists of two different procedures, costs around $20,000 dollars and must be performed by the end of April.

"The best doctors have to fly into Bulgaria from all over the world because her condition is so bad and because it is so expensive and rare," Stantcheva said.

In just one week, Stantcheva and her team have raised $750 for the young girl.

"We have been offering free candy and even massages," she said. "We'd ask for $5 for a 15 minute massage and people would give us $10!"

This week, Stantcheva is planning on asking for donations from faculty offices and local businesses.

"We don't have a deadline but the sooner we collect the money, the better," she said.

After the money is raised for the young girl, Stantcheva hopes to continue her work and fundraising for other children all over the world.

"We are going to work one case at a time," she said. "Once this is over I want to work raising money for foster homes — the whole idea is to work with one case at a time because then you know you get something done."

Stantcheva said this issue is so important because poverty is such a major crisis around the world. She spent some of her childhood living in Bulgaria, a desperately underdeveloped country.

"I've seen children in the streets, foster homes where the children are sharing clothes and food, it's tragic," she said. "In this country children have a lot of rights — it's amazing — that doesn't happen in other countries, children live by themselves or with siblings, there is not so much concentration on children there, more on government issues."

Stantcheva says she has been overwhelmed by the positive response her fundraising has received. She began fundraising with three people and many students have shown interest in helping.

"I am a firm believer that it only takes on person to change the world, and these children are the future of the country, if they can contribute with all their heart and best intentions, they can all make a little difference to make a great change," she said.

If you would like to make a donation or to find out how you can help out, please contact Denitza Stantcheva at 546-0464, or e-mail her at Denicas2001@yahoo.com.

Students pause to read a sign about the Graduate Student Employee Organization 48-hour hunger strike yesterday. The strike was organized to protest the new international student fee.

GEO stages 48-hour hunger strike to protest international student fee

By Ferlon Salniker
Collegian Staff

Braving the rainy weather, a group of University of Massachusetts international students are demonstrating their opposition to the new international student fee by camping out in front of the Whitmore Administration Building for a 48-hour hunger strike.

The strike, which began yesterday at 10 a.m., will be followed by a rally tomorrow at noon outside of Whitmore. About 15 graduate students spent yesterday picketing and talking to passing students and faculty. Several protesters spent the night in tents set up on the Whitmore lawn. The students are alternating shifts to enable them to continue teaching while the strike is underway.

"We're holding the 48-hour hunger strike to support those withholding from paying the fee," said Ibrahim Dahlstrom-Hakki, a graduate student from Jordan who is working on his Ph.D. in cognitive psychology. "[The hunger strike] is to have the administration wake up, to show that we're serious and not going to back down."

The highly controversial $65 fee was added to international students' bills for the spring semester. The fee was due on March 11 and 250 students have refused to pay. During the first week of April, those 250 students received letters from the administration threatening administrative withdrawal if the fee is not paid by April 20.

"Obviously there is a lot of fear in this, the administration has been trying to foster that fear. There will be a number of students who will pay the fee," said Dahlstrom-Hakki. "I can only speak for myself, I don't intend to pay the fee. If UMass deports me, that's fine, I'm not going to pay for my own surveillance."

That surveillance is part of the fee that covers compliance with the Student Exchange Visitor Information System, a requirement the Patriot Act put in place following the events of Sept. 11.

While 8 percent of the fee will be used to fund a one-person position whose job is to coordinate international students' visa information into the federal government's SEVIS database, the other $60 will be put toward specific services for international students provided by the International Programs Office, Director Frank Hugus told The Massachusetts Daily Collegian in March.

"The hunger strike has symbolic value to us ... for most of international students the fee is a financial burden. We don't have enough money to eat and pay the fee," said Anil Duman, an economics graduate student from Turkey.

Duman explained that the hunger strike is an effective form of protest and allows the strikers to continue their daily lives.

"It won't interrupt our work, it enables me to protest and do my work," she said. "We didn't want to hurt the undergraduates."

In addition to passing students' positive reactions, the demonstrators said they have received numerous forms of support from the UMass community.

The strike was organized by the Graduate Employee Organization, and has received support from the Graduate Student Senate. Several academic departments such as the economics and computer science departments have also made statements against the fee. In addition, the research council of the Faculty Senate and a representative from the Amherst Town Council has shown their opposition to the fee, said Dahlstrom-Hakki.

A UMass police officer did stop by the outside of Whitmore, but Dahlstrom-Hakki said it was only to see what was going on.

"He told us that we had the right to be here ... he just wanted to know who to contact if there were any problems," he said.

At press time, Chancellor John V. Lombardi had not yet issued a comment on the strike.

Scientists want Boston University biology lab nixed

By Theo Emery
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Nearly 150 scientists and scholars, including two Nobel laureates, asked city officials Tuesday to block a high-security biological research laboratory that Boston University plans to build in the city's South End neighborhood.

The scientists, as well as neighborhood and environmental groups, sent a letter to Mayor Thomas Menino and city councilors asking them to nix the lab, which would house scientists researching vaccines and handling deadly agents that could be used in a bioterror attack. The letter was also sent to Boston University trustees.

"There are real and potentially catastrophic risks to the health and safety of people in the local and surrounding communities," the letter reads.

Faculty from Harvard, MIT, Boston University, Boston College and other schools signed the letter, including Harvard's Dr. Eric Chivian and Dr. Bernard Lown, co-founders of International Physicians for the Prevention of Nuclear War, which received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1985. Noam Chomsky, a prominent MIT linguistics professor and political activist, also signed.

Boston University received a $128 million federal grant last fall to build the lab. The project still needs federal and state environmental reviews, a year, and the laboratory is not expected to open until 2007, BU spokeswoman Ellen Berlin said. The University of Texas received funding for a similar laboratory in Galveston.

Senator Kerry addresses college population in campaign

Democratic presidential candidate Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., addresses a crowd during a rally on the campus of the University of Rhode Island, yesterday.

Speaking to campuses across the nation, Massachusetts Senator and presidential hopeful John Kerry spoke to students on the University of Massachusetts campus yesterday during a conference call as part of his Campus Tour 2004.

The "Change Starts with U: Kerry Campus Tour 2004" campaign began earlier this week, with Kerry speaking to students at the University of New Hampshire by phone. He then met with students from the University of Rhode Island and answered questions to college reporters.

In a press release about his tour, Kerry said, "George Bush owes America's youth an apology. Thanks to his fiscal recklessness and failed economic policies, today's college graduates are facing fewer jobs and a bigger share of national debt."

Senator Kerry addressed callers today with the same message. In a brief speech, he told reporters how important it is that the youth of today understand the issue of college affordability.

"College tuitions have increased 28 percent," Kerry said, "and that is after inflation. Remarkably 220,000 people have been priced out of college this year because of rising tuition."

Kerry went on to say that the Bush administration has made significant tax cuts for the wealthy, causing individual states and colleges to suffer.

"Tax cuts for the wealthy are tuition increases to the students," he said. "There is a $200 billion combined shortfall to states."

Kerry is proposing to keep campaigning strongly with tax relief and the Education Reform Act. He said that he proposes $25 billion to state programs and another $50 billion in tax credits to reduce the tuition spending among students. With this plan, each student would potentially receive $4,000 in credit towards his/her tuition. Also, he proposed to pay for state college tuition for those who are willing to serve for their country.

"This is a choice of common sense," Kerry said, "this is the greatest job loss since Herbert Hoover was president."

One student from Georgetown expressed concern about Kerry's plan to cut back some of his original proposals.

"I will be cutting back the service program because of affordability," he said, "but I will keep the tax credit for students, the No Child Left Behind Act and reduce healthcare for Americans so that we can put money back in people's pockets."

Kerry also hopes to get uninterested college students interested in voting.

"Young people have enormous power," he said, "they need to go and embrace it; it was most young people in the 1970s who drove the civil rights movements, we need to make issue voting issues."

Kerry criticized the Bush administration again about neglecting the non wealthy.

"You empower people that have money," he said about the current administration, "then you go back on air quality and water quality."

Kerry is also proposing to push the technology curve in which he hopes to create 10 million jobs in the next four years.

New bioterrorism lab not worth the risk

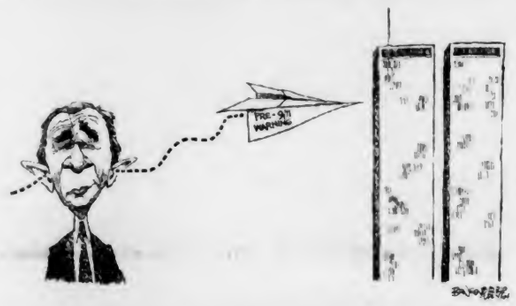
Boston University is generating major heat from scientists and scholars who have written letters to Boston city officials protesting the construction of a new BU building, according to The Boston Globe. While another building outline against the Beantown skyline may not seem particularly upsetting, the plan has ruffled the feathers of nearly 150 major scientists and educators nationwide for a simple reason.

The new building will be a bioterrorism lab.

"We believe that Boston is the best place for this laboratory," said Ellen Berlin, BU spokesperson.

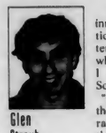
But is the Bay State ready to have a major laboratory, housing deadly agents such as the plague, Ebola, and anthrax? Not according to MIT linguistics professor and political activist Noam Chomsky, or Nobel Prize winners Dr. Eric Chivian and Dr. Bernard Lown, Harvard, MIT, Boston College and even BU staff members have also voiced their opposition in a letter addressed to city officials.

Granted, BU is wedged between a rock and a hard place. A federal grant of $128 million was awarded to the university to build the lab last fall. The lab is set to open in 2007, with construction beginning next year. Mayor Menino is in full support of the building.



"This new biolab will help anchor a life sciences region in that section of the city. It means jobs now and into the future," said Seth Gitell, spokesman for Menino. However, many question the safety risks that go along with the bioterrorism lab.

"I have become very strongly convinced that this laboratory does not serve a public health function," he said. "In fact, it's counterproductive with respect to public health, and it does present risk to the community," said Dr. David Ozonoff, professor in the BU School of Public Health.



The mission of any university should be to strengthen the foundations of education and research. BU has been given money to create a critical research facility that may prove priceless by making advancements in defense for our nation against bioterrorism attacks. However, creating a storage house of bioterrorism materials is setting the scene for disaster. Our country has already suffered a major terrorist attack on a major eastern seaboard city. Why would government officials consider providing terrorists with a new target that could have much more devastating consequences than 9/11 ever could? An attack on a major building like the World Trade Center may result in the deaths of those who are in the vicinity. An attack or invasion of a building housing the most deadly diseases in the world could result in the deaths of thousands, possibly millions of people.

Even after 9/11, national security is not flawless. BU needs to look for a new, more secure area of the country to build a bioterrorism lab. While the facility could provide Massachusetts students and educators with an important educational tool, the risk to national security — and possibly the fate of our nation — is not worth gambling with on the open shoreline.

South Africa: 10 years later

Glen Straub

There is an innocent question people tend to ask when learning I studied in South Africa.

"So, like, was there a lot of racism over there?"

It's like a tune on heavy rotation to my ears.

Some are blunt and ask it right away; some wait till after the long-winded description of the beautiful countryside; and many try to beat around the bush on asking the tough "controversial" question because — as some of us might know — racism is the most under acknowledged problem on this earth.

I don't blame anyone though for their interest in that part of my experience. To an outsider of the Republic of South Africa, it is easy to immediately associate the nation with racism.

The forefathers of the Apartheid system wouldn't want it any other way.

However, all month there has been some enlightening news coming out of the nation plagued by crime, AIDS, poverty and — yes, all together now — racism. There are many celebrating a newfounded freedom.

April 27, 2004 marks the 10th anniversary of when African National Congress president Nelson Mandela took office. A democracy was instilled and Apartheid — the institutionalized racist political system that marred the country for nearly 50 years — officially ended.

Literally meaning "apartness" in the Afrikaans language, Apartheid segregated the majority native population both economically and socially from the minority European settler contingency when the Afrikaaner (Dutch colonists) National Party took over the country in 1948.

And let's just say there wasn't any Plessy v. Ferguson case to catalyze a "separate but equal" guideline.

Non-violent protests, civil disobedience and full-out riots, such as the Soweto student uprising in 1976, led to international pressure in the 1980s and finally in 1994 the first majority black government was elected into office to represent the majority black republic.

April 27, 2004 also marks a possible new wave of change for South Africa, as the third democratically elected president will be inaugurated. Today, as we Americans can only ponder whom our next commander in chief will be, South Africa will use the democratic practices Mandela and his confidants fought for by holding its third-ever democratic elections to determine which party will take over the 400-member National Assembly.

The existing power, the ANC, is the favorite in today's elections and the current president of the South Africa, Thabo Mbeki, will most likely take on a second term if the ANC gets the majority vote.

While it's the ANC that gets most of the credit for saving the country's Blacks, Coloureds (mixed race) and Indians from the chains of Apartheid, the party has struggled to make a smooth transition into the 'all is fair and equal' democracy.

Police corruption and crime are straining the cities of Cape Town, Johannesburg and Durban; unemployment has sky-rocketed to more than 30 percent; the AIDS epidemic is at an all-time high (nearly 40 percent of those living in the Kwazulu-Natal province are infected with at least the HIV virus); and the 1994 Reconstruction and Development program has failed to live up to its expectations and those promised land have failed to receive it.

And just from personal experience working in the township of Kensington, outside the Cape Flats, the lower-class non-whites living in run-down, necessity-lacking shantytowns across South Africa are in no better situation than they were 10 years ago.

There is very little to celebrate.

In the New York Times, Mbeki was quoted as saying during a recent state of the nation address that, "We have always known that our country's blemishes, produced by more than three centuries of colonialism and Apartheid, could not be removed in one decade."

And he is completely right in this matter.

European colonialism destroyed the infrastructure of the most beautiful place on earth — our Motherland Africa. You can see it all over the continent (quick reminder: this year is also the 10th anniversary of the Rwandan Genocide).

But 10 years have gone by since Apartheid in South Africa and like any moment of history, people are beginning to not think about it anymore — therefore forgetting that it was the colonists that put the country in this current shaky state — not the ANC.

My roommate in Cape Town, Mattepalo Malou, a 20-year-old University of Cape Town student from right outside Jo'Burg, kept telling me when I asked about it that she didn't even remember living in Apartheid.

But then she would go on to say that she doesn't feel comfortable around white South Africans — especially if she walks into the nightclub that is "socially" known as a "white club."

So when people ask me if there is a lot of racism, I say "well it's not written in stone anymore?"

Is love really worth it?

Elizabeth Carter

Emotion is a weapon that the weak shrink from. To give unabashedly, to lay your heart on the table is to say: here take it — and if you do you shall feel the heights of joy, but you shall risk the depths of despair, dare you take it? Dare you touch something that has so great potential both for destruction and for elation? Or do you run? Do you hide, do you build walls around yourself? Do you shirk from love and slink away, justifying the fact that you know love because you've been burnt by it before? Do you explain to yourself and anyone who will lend you an open ear, that love is pain, and only the strong can resist the pain that love brings, only the strong defend themselves from the imminent internal death that giving emotion unabashedly may very well, and often does bring.

Or is it possible that those who recite this familiar defense against love are merely pretending they are strong by building emotional walls around themselves, and in actuality they are the weak in disguise? Bravery is not displayed behind the walls of a fortress (emotional or otherwise). No knight in shining armor ever hides behind the castle walls claiming he knows all too well what pain the war raging outside them will bring, and that he is too strong and too smart to risk himself for glory, for victory, for life.

Life cannot be fully lived in hiding. Yet it seems that so many people in life are running from emotion. Love namely. But are defenses something that everyone puts up? Are we all so cynical that we won't even risk ourselves anymore for the chance at having it all? Have we been beaten and emotionally bruised so many times that the idea of actually putting ourselves out there simply isn't worth it anymore? Have the majority of us sacrificed the idea of love and traded it for seedy sexual surface pleasures?

Who needs love? We've got the here and now, and that's enough, right? Personally I tend to think not, the day meaningless sex equates with earth-moving love is the day hell freezes over, and I'm not breaking out my ice skates anytime soon. So now the question is, why are so many of us willing to settle for cheap physical pleasure that doesn't even scratch the surface of real emotion?

It's beginning to seem as if most of us simply give up hope, the childish concept that is usually cast aside by the age of 25 for the real world, and instead hide our emotions away deep inside ourselves. Then we guard our hidden emotions with witty sayings, and justifications about why they are foul, we convince ourselves thoroughly that love will hurt us, but we are smart, we will outsmart love by never feeling it. Then one day we accidentally get close to someone, and as soon mutual emotion begins to brim near the surface we immediately run. Then we recite our song and dance of reasons "He/she was too clingy, I'm not ready for a relationship right now, blah, blah, lie, blah." We steep ourselves in these reasons until we believe them, until their meanings are imbedded in us, and then we forget the reasons and retain their implications, leaving ourselves to simply regard our former love with slight regret, and disdain. Yet the reality behind the failed relationship is that all along we were running from fears lodged deeply within ourselves. Running from a past of damaged broken love (sexual, parental or otherwise), running from the pain and anguish we formerly suffered and swore we would never feel again — running in circles, defeating ourselves.

So it seems this game of love gives us two options: on one hand we can risk it, we can face love and pain and take them both in stride, we can move forward and let the experiences we accumulate change us, and at times force us to grow into bigger better people. On the other hand we can hide, bury all that we have to give deeply inside ourselves and push away all those who try to dig deeper into us, and live a life that is safe. Live a half-life of hiding, never really feeling the highs, and never really feeling the lows. Are so many people in our cynical society giving up cashing in the few chips they have and settling for the stagnant dull pain of self induced extended solitude as a substitute for the searing pain of love, which they fear so? I sincerely hope not.

It is the brave who feel. It is the brave who can be tormented, shattered and dashed upon the rocks, by love, only to rise from the ashes, rebuild and try to love again. And if any of this rings true for you, if you've been hurt, if you've been burnt by love one time too many, just remember it is only the weak who try to hide from themselves, and in doing so they damn themselves to a life of purgatory. Never loving, but never hurting, never really feeling much of anything, nothing extreme that is. And what is life without polarizations? What is life,without the highs and without the lows? This game of life may be rigged, for with every great happiness if you take it away the pain will feel twice as great, but hide from the game altogether and there's not even a chance of winning.

Unsolicited homophobia

Scott Eldridge II

Monday morning I walked into my kitchen and saw the lights flashing on my answering machine (a rare occurrence). Naturally I pressed "play," and was appalled at what I heard.

It was a father of three, or so he said. The point of the call was to inform me that all hope was not lost; that despite what I had probably heard, something could be done. Gay marriage could be stopped.

I did not want this call. I did not request it. But because he was not selling anything besides his opinion, this anti-gay marriage advocate could get my number without worrying about the government do-not-call lists my home phone is registered under.

I couldn't listen to the whole message. Between my rising anger and my utter disbelief that this was on my answering machine I managed to not delete it.

That evening, when I came home my roommate had heard the message as well. He was equally appalled that this message was on our machine.

Neither of us has ever opposed gay marriage. In fact, we are both strong supporters of marriage equality. In our generally liberal household we debate only the political pundits on television, the president, the Catholic Church and the governor and were we home when the unnamed father of three called, we would have debated him.

Polls are washy on the issue, but it is safe to say that the state and the country are split over the issue of gay marriage with numbers at or around 50 percent in either direction. So the father of three, in his unsolicited phone call, took the gamble and assumed that we would be interested in his moral opinion, which I can only describe as homophobia.

It rivals another full court press from the anti-gay marriage camp: the Catholic Church's campaign of leaflets sent to almost every known Catholic home in Massachusetts. At quite the expense, these brochures went out to homes without asking opinions, without taking in any measure of personal feelings, but instead as an uber-command from a pontificate: Gay is wrong, you'd better not support it.

There is something to be said for the fact that no such campaign was started to inform the faithful of the harm of child abuse by priests. The Boston Phoenix newspaper pointed this out.

The gay marriage issue seems to have brought out the worst in people. The father who called my apartment said he was worried, fearful even, of the state Massachusetts would be in if gay marriage is allowed and what his children would have to live with.

Do these people get it? Do gay people go away, in their minds, if they can't get married? Will banning gay people from marriage, either civil or religious, disrupt their interpersonal relationships?

No, no, no.

This seems to me like logic, but I suppose it is, in truth, little more than logical opinion. In most every argument and debate I get into I can understand the other side, I know the positions for and against oil drilling in Alaska, fishing in the Atlantic, fighting in Iraq, acting without prudence in the Middle East: I understand pros and cons on these issues even while I stand on one side.

Do these people get it? Do gay people go away, in their minds, if they can't get married? Will banning gay people from marriage, either civil or religious, disrupt their interpersonal relationships? No, no, no.

But this debate is different: there is no argument on the other side that I can see, none beyond fear stemming from ignorance.

Take the national council of Catholic Bishops who are right now debating the way the church should "deal with" politicians who don't tow the religious line. Should they be excommunicated? Barred from receiving communion?

These are actual questions being raised, which is to say that a senator who supports a woman's right to choose and a lesbian couple's right to marry might be kicked out of the church. The question was raised leading up to Easter Sunday when bishops cried out against John Kerry going to a Catholic service. John Kerry supports a woman's right to choose and other non-Catholic agenda items.

Excommunication is the result of the final insult being thrown at the church, the straw that breaks the back. In Massachusetts, politicians who have voted their conscience and not the church's have already been forced to endure public ridicule (even at Sunday Mass in their hometown churches) and harassing remarks from fellow believers. Now they too would be kicked out of a church that has probably long played a role in their lives.

I wonder if any of these politicians got phone calls Monday morning. I'm sure they did, and I'm sure they were much stronger, and much worse.

Two more seasons? Aye carumba!

Dan O'Brien

I remember it like it was yesterday. At age 5, my dad and I are walking down Main St. of my hometown when he says, "Have you seen that new cartoon show on TV?"

"What show?"

"It's called 'The Simpsons,' it's so funny! Your mom will probably kill me if I let you watch it though."

Hence, my addiction to "The Simpsons" began. Today, only rehab will wean me off of the greatest animated sitcom of all time.

Who will forget that infamous summer of 1995 when America was wondering who shot Mr. Burns? Or when Ralph Wiggum proclaimed, "Me fail English? That's unpossible!" What about the time when Homer traveled with the likes of the Smashing Pumpkins for the "Hallapalooza" rock n' roll tour, and graciously took the wrath of a cannonball to the gut?

It's amazing to realize that this show is now in its 15th season, making it the longest running sitcom in television history. M*A*S*H previously held the record for the longest running sitcom with 11 seasons. Thanks to the brilliance of the show's writers and creator Matt Groening, the characters of Bart, Homer, Marge, Lisa, Maggie, and the others are all ones that we college students have grown up with.

But now, the word on the Web is that Groening wants to keep the show going for another 2 seasons. He has also reportedly signed on to make two full-length feature films of The Simpsons. The debate of whether the show deserves another two seasons continues.

In the past couple of years, many friends of mine and critics in the media have said that the quality of the episodes has been going down hill. People have said the stories are getting too outrageous and therefore, are not that funny. (I.E. Krusty the Klown getting elected to Congress is probably not going down in the history books as one of the funniest episodes.) There have also been many complaints with what the writers have done with the character of Homer. He went from being stupid, but still a dad looking out for the best interests of his kids to being really stupid. Homer used to do things like get on a skateboard and jump over Springfield Gorge to teach Bart a lesson, to more recently, trying to get information about Lisa by hiring a detective, who ends up framing her for burglarizing an animal testing facility because Homer didn't pay him.

There were some stretches this summer when an American soldier would be killed every day, on some days two or three. Soldiers even began to ask why, publicly criticizing their superiors.

But, as we all know so well, not every newer episode has been bad. "Weekend at Burnsie's," when Homer becomes addicted to medicinal marijuana (season 13) became a new classic. One of the most memorable quotes from the show was in the scene when Marge confronts Homer about doing drugs. Homer, laughing, hands his prescription to Marge and says, "But Marge, it's making my eyes better, and it's legal. I could walk up to the president and blow smoke in his stupid, monkey face, and he'd just have to sit there, grooooving on it." Another notable episode was "How I Spent My Summer Vacation," (season 14) when Homer went to Rock 'N Roll Fantasy Camp to pick up pointers from rock stars like Mick Jagger, Keith Richards, and Lenny Kravitz on how to rock.

The show still brings in decent ratings. As the show has grown in popularity over the years, there has been a plethora of celebrity cameos. Celebrity guest stars have ranged from Carmen Electra, Tony Hawk, Blink 182, Mr. T, Jon Lovitz and Phish in recent seasons to Kelsey Grammar, Tito Puente, Paul and Linda McCarthy, Rodney Dangerfield, David Duchovny, Gillian Anderson, David Hyde Pierce, and Phil Hartman in seasons past, just to name a few.

The show is so popular that it has spawned a generation of Simpsons geeks like me and my friends. One of these fellow geeks is a student from Brooklyn College who recently wrote a book, which delves into the "academic issues" of our favorite dysfunctional cartoon characters. Nineteen-year-old Steven Kelsowitz just published a 160-page book titled "The Simpsons and Society." He held a book-signing release on April 5 at a store in Brooklyn, NY, which sold 59 copies.

"It took me about five weeks," Keslowitz said. "It was great. Nobody ever thought I'd write a book on The Simpsons."

He told the Ottawa Citizen that his favorite episode is no. 163, "The Springfield Files," in which special agents Mulder and Scully (Gillian Anderson and David Duchovny from the former hit FOX show "The X-Files") pursue a ghostly figure that turns out to be an iridescent Mr. Burns.

"I found the jokes in the show unbelievable," said Keslowitz.

One of a few examples Kelsowitz gave to back up this statement was one in which Homer said, "Well, it's 1 a.m. Better go home and spend some quality time with the kids."

Over the past 15 years, the laughs have been endless. When Bart caught the three-eyed fish, when Marge became a cop and arrested Homer, when Bart got expelled, when Homer framed Marge for D.U.I., and when Apu closed the Kwik-E-Mart for the first time ever, declaring, "For the next five minutes, I'm going to party like it's on sale for $19.99!" we all laughed. Who can forget all the years of brilliant comedy?

From pointing out the subtle stereotypes of American society through the portrayals of Apu, the convenience store clerk and sleezy attorney Lionel Hutz, to celebrating Homer's free spirit, most fans can't seem to get enough of America's favorite family. Further evidence that The Simpsons has truly been bringing people together is the fact that it is the only show, ever, in the history of television that is equally watched among Caucasians and African-Americans.

Although the show has had bumps in the road, I have stuck by it since age 5 and I am not going to give up now. Love them or hate them, The Simpsons is a classic that has strived to make fun of pop culture for a decade and a half and has changed the face of television at the same time. So, bring on more episodes and make some movies, because as Mr. Burns would say, this show is "exxxxcellent."

Pushing the envelope: a depressing trend

Johnny Donaldson

There's so much that's wrong in the world — hunger, war, Bush's presidency — that it's not impossible to get lost in the thickets of chaos. With images of violence and corruption assaulting our eyes every night on the evening news, with one headline after the next bringing in some sort of bad news, it gets decidedly depressing to just be human. Sometimes it's worth it to step back and look at how wacky, weird and wonderful this world really is. Let's venture into this land we call home and marvel at a few of the strange things happening:

H-Bomb is here. For those of you don't know — and that's pretty much everyone — H-Bomb is Harvard's newest magazine. It's newest porno magazine. The brainiac rich kids who attend everyone's favorite Ivy League school have decided to put out their own adult rag. We here at The Massachusetts Daily Collegian have actually received not one, but two copies of this prestigious new journalistic endeavor. For a magazine published by such an affluent community it's pretty bad — even by pornographic standards. The layout, art design and paper are cheap, more akin to a glossy Wal-Mart flyer than a readable magazine. It's more funny than sexy, more ludicrous than arousing, more silly than erotic. All in all, it's a practice Harvard should let slide into oblivion — not because of moral reasoning, but it's actually goofier than they probably wanted it to be!

Eye Jewelry. I am — and some of you may doubt me, but I really am — an advocate for self-expression. I truly am. But there's a point, in every person's life, when you don't need to express yourself any further. Generally, I believe that point comes just before you start surgically inserting little silver hearts into your eye.

In a news story from CNN.com, those crazy Dutch doctors have discovered a way to pioneer a new fad in jewelry and body modification — inserting little, special-made designs (.13 inches each) into the mucous membrane of the eye for anywhere between $600-1200 a pop. "In my view it is a little bit more subtle than (body) piercing," says eye surgeon Gerritt Melles. In my view, it's freaky, creepy (check out those pictures) and just plain old scary. There's always some new idiotic trend bubbling up to the surface — fake tans in the winter, breast implants, branding — but this has go to be the most moronic by far. I can't even look at the friggin' pictures of a JewelEye without squirming in my seat.

Blood Drive Brouhaha. So, in Missouri, there's this sorority, at the University of Missouri-Columbia and they were doing the blood drive. Okay, that's fine. No harm in that right? No … unless the blood drive co-ordinator for your house gets overzealous and demands that every girl lie to donate blood — regardless if you just had a tattoo or a piercing or are sick. Yes, because that's what every blood drive needs — tainted plasma.

According to CNN.com, Christie Key, co-ordinator for Gamma Phi Beta, circulated an e-mail that demanded that the sisters donate blood — or suffer severe punishment. As she froths in her message: "I dont [sic] care if you got a tattoo last week LIE. I dont [sic] care if you have a cold. Suck it up. We all do. LIE. Recent peircings [sic]? LIE." Wow.

Actually, reading these stories is just as depressing as hearing about the latest terrorist attack in the Middle East. We have Harvard — a bastion of intelligence and sophistication — putting out a porn magazine … and an incompetently made one at that. There's an eyeball jewelry fad that pushes fashionista trends to the breaking point. And then there's the actions of a sorority queen who treats a noble effort as a high stakes competition. Maybe society is really going to the crapper. Or maybe people just like acting like idiots.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

THE POWER OF LANGUAGE

I found it interesting how Ben Duffy claimed that liberals use biased language in order to make people see their point of view. I wonder if he realizes that he was doing the same exact thing in his editorial. I personally could not control my anger as I read how he denounced the March for Women's Lives as a "March for Infanticide." If in fact he had better informed himself — as editorial writers are expected to do — he would realize that abortion is not the only issue we are planning to march for. in fact, a "healthy respect for sex," as Duffy wrote, is on the agenda as well.

I am not getting into an abortion debate here, but I believe it is a woman's right to choose, and a right that is currently being threatened by the Bush administration. Not only that, but with his "conservative-speak," as I may call it, Duffy makes it sound like the women who plan on marching are just marching for their right to kill babies, which is pretty biased as well, wouldn't you say? Hey Ben... never underestimate the power of language.

Iraqi quagmire

IRAQI QUAGMIRE

As anyone who has picked up a newspaper recently knows, there are two popular uprisings against American rule in Iraq. Already having cost many American lives, the fighting rages on and seems to be spreading. We now know that the chicken-hawk Bush administration has been deceiving us, and that the current insurgency involves Shiites and Sunnis that extend far beyond the influence of a rogue cleric and former Baath party leaders. The fighting has moved well beyond the Sunni Triangle. Three cities have been lost to insurgents.

Meanwhile, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld has pleaded with Americans to simply stay the course in this, as Rumsfeld calls it, "test of will." Tens of thousands of troops won't be sent home due to this uprising, but that should not sway us from America's mission in Iraq.

I say enough with this.

The quagmire in Iraq is worsening everyday. The United States has just lost control of three separate Iraqi cities. Iraqi insurgents are fueled by nationalistic sentiment, and won't be easily quelled. Yet, Donald Rumsfeld has the audacity to declare the soldier's efforts in Iraq a "test of will?" That's bull.

Forget having a will to fight, we don't even know why we are fighting in Iraq anymore. We know "weapons of mass destruction" was a bogus excuse to go to war, and now it appears Iraqis are outright rejecting Americans efforts to "liberate" them.

The Bush administration is a bunch of callous monsters. They won't admit their mistakes and work for a solution as long as they are in power. Nonetheless, somebody has to do something. Somebody has to put the United Nations in charge of Iraq and back it up with an American led peacekeeping force. It must be done soon, because the United Nations will not come to the rescue if a full-blown rebellion is underway.

Unless the United States wants to face the full wrath of 20 million Sunnis and Shiites, unless the United States wants a second Vietnam style quagmire, which many people, such as Massachusetts Senator Ted Kennedy, believe we already have, then the United States has to admit its wrongdoing, and relinquish control to the United Nations immediately. We can't just sit passively by and let the Bush administration lie about how they have things under control.

AN INEFFECTIVE SYSTEM

When run properly, recycling programs can lead to a tremendous decrease in the volume of municipal waste brought to a landfill. In order for a recycling program to be effective, recyclables must reach their final destination at a recycling facility.

As a student in the Environmental Science program, I have become more conscience of the earth and its resources. I have not recycled throughout my whole life, but I have been recycling for the past 10 years. When I arrived at the University of Massachusetts, I was happy to see recycling bins for paper and bottles in the dorms trash rooms.

For the past two semesters, I have been living and recycling in Southwest. But recently, my suspicion that my recyclables were not being recycled was confirmed. Last Monday, I emptied my bottles and cans into the red recycling bin (for cans and bottles) in the trash room in Patterson Hall. Later that day, I threw away rubbish in the same trash room, and when I opened the trash container lid, I noticed many recyclables on the top of this trashcan. More specifically, they were the same items I had placed into the recycle bin earlier that day. These included Odwalla, Nantucket Nectar, and Yoo-hoo bottles as well as plastic gallon water jugs. These items may have represented any dorm citizens' recyclables. But the most compelling reason I knew these items were mine, was a cream cheese container I purchased from a bagel store in New Lebanon, New York. This container clearly had a Bucky's bagel label on the top of it, and I doubt many people have even heard of this bagel store.

I immediately peered into the adjacent red recycling bin and found it was half full, and the items I had placed in this been had been shuffled into the trash container. Events such as this particular recycling switcharoo may have been happening all year long at Patterson.

The next morning I went outside Patterson before the trash was collected and I observed there were only trash containers, and no main recycling containers put out for collection. This lack of recycling containers being put out for collection has continued everyday since I became aware of this situation. I believe all the recyclables for the dorm are ending up in the trash. I found the main collection recycling bins both stashed away in the laundry room. I don't know why these bins were in the laundry room, but I do know they are not being utilized.

My major question: Is the recycling program at the UMass effective? From evidence I have seen at Patterson Hall I believe the recycling program is far from effective here at UMass. All the students living in Patterson who think they are recycling loyally are really just contributing to the increase in municipal trash. In order for our recycling system here at UMass to be optimally effective, something has to be done to make sure what students are recycling is actually being recycled, and not thrown in the trash.

Innovative circus show returns to TV on Bravo

Ryan Aubert

"Invoke, provoke, evoke the imagination" is the slogan of Cirque du Soleil, the highly regarded French-Canadian avant-garde company that has revolutionized the circus and the theater world, bringing both together in a glorious fusion. Last year, Cirque broke into the weekly series gamut on the Bravo network with "Fire Within", a 13-episode documentary of the creation of one of their shows. "Fire Within" gained critical praise for its up close and personal depiction of the artists it followed, even winning an Emmy last September.

This year, Cirque is again breaking into the television business with a show titled "Solstrom." This new show features numerous physical acts set upon a narrative, with a little drama and comedy mixed in. The end result is a variety show that is a little bit cheesy, a little bit tacky, but yet still engaging all the same (in natural Cirque fashion.)

What's so special about Cirque anyway? Quite simply, their live shows are amazing. They are a mixture of color, light, visuals, live music, and physical feats presented in a theatrical context. There are currently nine shows operating on three continents.

"Solstrom" though is not a Cirque live show. Rather, it harks back 30 or 40 years ago when primetime variety shows were the rage, with the whole family gathering around the tube. "Solstrom" is a spectacle that is to be enjoyed by everybody, regardless of age.

Yet, because of this, "Solstrom" falls a little short. The production quality seems cheapened, since everything looks "fake." The show is filmed on a soundstage (even if the setting appears to be outdoors) and some of the acting seems tacky at best.

All the bad things aside though, "Solstrom" does deliver on its various acts. Some of them are taken from established Cirque shows, while others are wholly original. The premiere episode on Sunday featured the trampoline/fast track from the show "La Nouba", with bodies flying this way and that even in and out of windows. Very cool indeed.

Each episode of "Solstrom" has a different theme and narrative, thus making each of their shows somewhat unique. The premiere episode entitled "Romance" featured couples of all ages hanging out and sipping cappuccino in a piazza in Italy. These couples would then get up from their tables around the square and perform something crazy (after being showered with the "solar wind.") Another couple crossed a high wire to reach one another. How romantic!

Describing the acts here does not do them justice. These aren't some ordinary circus acts from the local county fair. These athletes are the best of the best, and it shows. Combined with awesome lighting and music, it is apparent that Cirque once again delivers itself in a new and fresh way.

"Cirque du Soleil: Solstrom" airs on Bravo, Sundays at 7 p.m.

Blowing into town

French performers, Air, set to rock Noho

By Evan Goldfried
Collegian Correspondent

It's a horrible scene. You walk in your room, and suddenly everything looks like the Beck video from 'Midnight Vultures.' Your computer's grinding with the television, the fridge's making nasty with the phone. The halogen lamp's in post-coitus with the fan while the camera is putting the moves on the space heater. Even the stereo is streaking.

The neighbors call the police. The cat is in hiding. You may never be able to touch your electric toothbrush again.

During all the commotion, playing gently in the background, bass-a-thumping, aural and hauntingly sterile is "Talkie Walkie," the most recent release from Air.

The French duo specializes in a sound that is both surprisingly intimate while simultaneously rooted in the artificial and electronic. However, Nicolas Godin and Jean Benoit Dunckel actually play their own instruments, which is perhaps what gives "Talkie Walkie" and its predecessors such a human feel.

Yes, they're French. Yes, the name of the band is Air. Yes, the name of the album is "Talkie Walkie" (which is how it directly translates from French, so it's not a bad joke). Think of their music as the illegitimate child of Barry White and Maximil-lian from The Black Hole: robotic ambiance, but with a pulse. You could try throwing "Talkie Walkie" on during a romantic evening with a partner of your choice. It might suck the love right out of the room or it might kink it up, results will most definitely vary. Attempt it at your own risk.

Air

"Talkie Walkie" expands Air's sound from its previous outings. The debut "Moon Safari" was smoother, but bordered that very thin Parisian line between atmospheric and soft-core porn. Their second album, the ill received "10,000hz Legend," was a bit too far gone to be enjoyable. Even the band has essentially passed that album off as the "experimental: what the hell were we thinking" piece.

And then came "Sofia Coppola." Air provided an eerie complement to the emotional and mysterious core of her debut in "The Virgin Suicides." The band's contribution to the movie's soundtrack was a lot more aggressive than any of their previous works had been.

"Talkie Walkie" pulls all of their sounds together as though you were watching newlyweds, arms locked in the serenity of a rose garden, all through the viewfinder of a telescope. The hand of Nigel Godrich, the uber-producer responsible for Radiohead and Beck's severely overlooked "Mutations," can also be attributed to Air's maturing sound. Listen especially to "Alone in Kyoto" (which is also featured on the soundtrack for Coppola's Lost in Translation.) It is the music of windshield wipers pushing rain off a windshield, with the gorgeousness of cloudy skies, and the warmth from the vents of a computer monitor.

Air will play the Pearl Street Nightclub in Northampton on April 14 at 8:30 p.m. If you plan to attend put your cell phone on vibrate. Who knows, you might get lucky.

European musicians, Nicolas Godin and Jean Benoit Dunckel, make up Air.

Butterfly ready for takeoff

By Nick Romanow
Collegian Staff

The female singer-songwriter market is perhaps one of the most overcrowded in music today. It seems like newcomers are popping up everywhere and, for the most part, nothing new is brought to the table. Butterfly Boucher, who is only a few years older then the average University of Massachusetts student, hopes not only to be a fresh voice, but also to be separated from the genre altogether. Her debut release, "Flutterby," on which she is the sole musician, certainly stands apart from her contemporaries. This is fine by Boucher who would rather be seen as her own entity and stand far away from the singer-songwriter types.

"I like my music to be (set up like a band)," Boucher explained in an interview with the Collegian, " … I don't really want to come across as a singer-songwriter folk chick."

And although she released the album under her own name, "Flutterby" isn't really Lillith Fair material. Rather, it's the type of pop music that ranges from fast tempo rock tracks ("Can You See The Lights") to stripped-down ballads ("Never Leave Your Heart Alone") but maintains its integrity all the way through.

The main reason that "Flutterby" doesn't blend in with releases from faux-musicians such like Avril Lavigne is that Boucher is a true artist and musician, who played music practically her whole life.

"I remember…lying underneath the grand piano and just thinking that was the best…I would've been about two years old," she said. Boucher is a multi-instrumentalist, which shows on the record, she is fond of everything from the piano to the guitar and even the drums.

Boucher's debut album "Flutterby," marks her emergence onto the singer/songwriter scene.

Butterfly Boucher — 'Flutterby' — A&M

"The earliest memory I have of playing an instrument was…a tiny little traveling keyboard. I knew how to use the drum machine on that and make it fast or slow and change the beat .. after that it would've been guitar and definitely when I was about 10 years old I was very serious piano…and drums as well after that. I kinda went in phases of what instruments I enjoy."

While one might think that handling all the responsibilities herself might be a bit overwhelming but Boucher seems to be very capable of handling her duties. "I'm pretty fast [when it comes to recording the song] if I've got the idea in my head," she said. "It's just a matter of finding the right instrument and the sound that I'm trying to get out. We might do a drum thing and there's a little squeak in the chair and I might want to emphasize that squeak so we'd go find the sound on a guitar, stuff like that. I move pretty fast, I grew up doing a lot of music sessions. I would be the session musician. I was 10 when I did that, so you build up a professional level of pace. We'd start at 11 in the morning and finish at 11 at night."

Along with writing music Boucher maintains the important factor of integrity; the tracks on "Flutterby" all feel more real and honest then the songs that will end up surrounding Boucher on the radio.

"I didn't get signed until I finished the album, which is great, I got to make the album that I wanted to," Boucher comments. "Basically on the strength of the recording we got several different labels involved…I went with the company that least wanted to change the album. That's an amazing position to be in, to be able to go 'no, not you, not you, not you.'"

Now that "Flutterby" is on the market and Boucher has begun to tour she is already getting accustomed to the odd press comparisons. "I've read the funniest comparisons, I keep reading them [and I think] 'what…are you listening to the right album?' I don't mind, people like Fiona Apple and Aimee Mann…that's flattering in a way; they are good songwriters and they aren't taking their clothes off - well, Fiona did a bit," Boucher laughs, "You can tell it's the music to them and that's the passion. It's when I get compared to Avril Lavigne and that kind of thing [I think] what?!"

Boucher probably won't be seeing to many more Lavigne references as word gets out that her album is about as genuine as it comes. While the "Flutterby" brand of pop-with-brains may not be for everyone, Boucher's musicianship and authenticity is bound to be appreciated especially in an industry that is becoming more and more fabricated.

Ford developing futuristic new safety features

By John Porretto
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) - Volvo is trying to retain its image as a leader in safety with new technology designed to help drowsy drivers.

Volvo and its owner, Ford Motor Co., released results of a study on the problem Wednesday at the New York Auto Show and announced plans for the technology to be included in Volvo cars and SUVs before the end of the decade.

Because the features are still several years from being offered in cars for sale, Ford was cagey about details for competitive reasons. It described a few different products that had been developed and were being considered as options.

Ford spokesman Mike Vaughn said they tested computerized optical scanning and a variety of warnings: a vibrating steering wheel, the sound of a car driving over rumble strips and a visual warning projected on the windshield. Researchers also tested a so-called "active" system in which the vehicle would actually adjust the steering automatically if it veered too far one way or the other.

"We've been able to demonstrate that we have the ability to alert a drowsy driver to a lane departure and improve their performance," said Jeff Greenberg, a technical specialist in Ford's research and advanced engineering department.

"We're confident we can do it in ways that drivers will accept," Greenberg said. "The new system will be adaptive and intelligent."

The safety enhancements also could be used on other Ford brands after Volvo's startup, the company said.

Luxury carmaker Infiniti said last month it will begin offering lane-departure warning systems in vehicles later this year, the first use of such accident-avoidance technology in North American passenger cars.

Employing a small camera, speed sensor and warning buzzer, the system is designed to alert drivers of unintentional movement out of a designated traffic lane. It will be offered this fall on 2005 models of Infiniti's FX sport utility vehicle, then again next spring on the 2006 M45 luxury sedan.

Ford and others have experimented with devices and high-tech systems to help stifle drowsy driving for at least two decades. But Art Spinella, president of CNW Marketing Research in Bandon, Ore., said he's not aware of any carmakers offering an instrument specifically designed to alert drivers when they're dozing at the wheel.

Spinella said automakers have studied systems that use cameras to scan drivers' eyes or sense when they're loosening their grip on the steering wheel beyond normal.

The challenge, he said, has been developing a marketable device without hitches.

"The issue is liability," Spinella said. "It has to be literally 100 percent fool proof before an automaker will use it."

Ford spent five months studying the problem of drowsy driving, which accounts for about 4 percent of all fatal crashes in the United States, or roughly 1,500 deaths each year.

Ford technician Jeff Greenberg stands in the Ford exhibit at the New York Auto Show, in New York, last Wednesday.

Boston's Brian Rolston gets a glove to the face from Montreal's Joe Juneau during the first period of Game 4 of the team's first round playoff series. The Bruins won 4-3 in double overtime to take a 3-1 series lead.

replay officials reviewed the play.

The replay showed Knuble put the puck just across the goal line inside the left post before it quickly rebounded out of the net.

The Bruins' bench erupted in cheers and the sellout Bell Centre crowd of 21,273 moaned its disappointment when referee Mick McGeough pointed to center ice to signal the goal. The clock was reset to 30.7 seconds remaining.

Mike Ribeiro scored twice and Kovalev had his third goal in two games for Montreal, which scored just once while losing the first two games in Boston.

Ribeiro, who many Bruins accused of faking an injury late in Montreal's 3-2 win in Game 3, found a much better way to get under their skin. He scored his first career playoff goal 4:41 in before the Bruins could lay a hand on him.

By the time Boston forward Brian Rolston knocked him to the ice, Ribeiro had already deflected a bouncing puck backward past Raycroft's right leg and inside the left post.

Patriots bring back Otis Smith

FOXBORO, Mass. — The New England Patriots signed veteran cornerback Otis Smith, less than a year after the team reluctantly released him as he struggled to recover from a shoulder injury.

Smith, 38, played last season with the Detroit Lions, where he played in all 16 games, starting the final 13. He had 59 tackles, an interception and 1.5 sacks.

Smith, a 14-year veteran, was a key contributor during New England's run to 2002 Super Bowl. His interception of St. Louis Rams quarterback Kurt Warner set up a field goal in the title game, which New England won 20-17.

Patriots coach Bill Belichick called Smith a "true champion" when he released him last August.

"Nobody has more respect for Otis than I do," Belichick said at the time. "It's a difficult roster decision that we made."

Smith has 564 career tackles, including 5.5 sacks. He has intercepted 29 passes for 645 yards and seven touchdowns.

He originally signed with the Philadelphia Eagles as a rookie free agent in 1990. He spent five seasons with the team before joining the Jets in 1995. He signed with the Patriots in 1996, starting nine games, including the playoffs and 1997 Super Bowl loss to Green Bay.

He rejoined the Jets in 1997 and was re-signed by New England just before the 2000 season.

Without a true superstar, boxing looking to another Tyson return

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

LAS VEGAS — If all goes according to plan, and it rarely does when Mike Tyson is involved, the former baddest man on the planet will walk into a Phoenix gym sometime this week and begin hitting the speed bag.

Or maybe he'll walk into a Phoenix strip club and begin hitting on the dancers instead. He's Mike Tyson, after all, so you never really know.

Tyson is 37 now, soon to be 38, and the days when he could terrorize an opponent simply by climbing into the ring seem only a distant memory. He's fought a total of 49 seconds in the last 22 months, and got the stuffing beat out of him by Lennox Lewis the last time he fought for the title.

Reasonable people shouldn't care anymore.

For some reason, though, we still do.

We're drawn to Tyson for the same reason we slow down to see an accident on the roadway, or stop to watch Phil Mickelson in the final round of a major (until Sunday, that is).

He's bitten off ears, tried to break arms and threatened to eat children. He's served time in prison for rape and been in more courtrooms than Judge Judy.

He's that accident waiting to happen, ready to implode or explode at any given moment. You're not sure what Tyson you'll get, but you can be sure that it will somehow be entertaining.

And there's no doubt that boxing can use somebody entertaining these days.

Not since the early 1980s has the heavyweight division been so devoid of talent and so lacking of personality. It's filled with alphabet soup champions who can't fight, can't sell tickets and don't ever fight each other.

There's an old adage on boxing that as the heavyweights go, so goes the sport. And right now, boxing is going down for the long count.

"At one point, the heavyweight champion was like being the president of the world," John Ruiz said. "It was that big. Now people have lost the interest."

Don't know who Johnny Ruiz is? He's the guy who sleepwalked through a loss to Roy Jones Jr. last year, then somehow became the WBA heavyweight champion once again by beating another guy (Hasim Rahman) whose biggest claim to fame was he gave away $15 million by signing an ill-advised deal with Don King.

Ruiz is one heavyweight champion. Chris Byrd, a nice guy and good family man who couldn't break the proverbial egg, is another. And the third will be decided April 24 when a Ukrainian (Vitali Klitschko) fights a South African (Corrie Sanders) to replace an Englishman (Lewis) who decided to quit while he was still ahead.

But wait. There's another title so minor no one mentions it much, but Lamon Brewster holds it after spending most of Saturday night getting his face punched in by Wladimir Klitschko before unleashing a series of punches that proved the giants do fall harder than most.

Brewster seems like a pleasant sort who thanks all the right people (God, Don King and his wife, in that order). But he's not going to make you forget Muhammad Ali, or remember John Ruiz, for that matter.

And you're still wondering what makes a Tyson return increasingly attractive?

"Pretty encouraging, isn't it?" Tyson said Saturday night after surveying the tattered remnants of the once-proud division.

King thinks so. He's spent the past year signing up anyone who weighed more than 200 pounds in hopes of controlling the heavyweight division so tightly that Tyson would have to deal with him to make any money.

So far, Tyson has resisted the temptation to sign despite being given $1 million and a new Bentley by King last summer as an inducement to get him to drop his $100 million lawsuit against King. That's just spending money and another ride for Tyson, who has made more than $300 million in the ring but is broke.

The plan right now is for Tyson to fight some stiff in July, then another stiff in the fall before meeting unbeaten Joe Mesi, possibly in December at Madison Square Garden. Since Tyson usually never sticks to the script, though, it wouldn't be wise to buy tickets just yet.

Meanwhile, the sorry heavyweight saga plays out this weekend at Madison Square Garden when Ruiz defends his WBA title against Fres Oquendo and Byrd fights Andrew Golota, the "Foul Pole" for the IBF title.

On paper, the two fights are so bad that you wonder how they can attach the words "heavyweight title" to them. At least Vitali Klitschko's WBC title fight with Sanders a week later has a bit of legitimacy because it is for the linear title that Lewis vacated.

If Klitschko is not haunted by his brother's knockout loss and wins a few more fights impressively, he still may emerge as the dominant heavyweight of his times.

Don't hold your breath, though. Vitali wasn't even thought of as the best fighter in his family before his stock went up by going six bloody rounds with an out-of-shape Lewis last June.

Until then, there's Tyson. Sure, he's a freak, and, yes, he's well past his time.

But at least he'll get you to watch.

More than anything, that's something that boxing needs badly these days.

Bruins win overtime thriller

Murray nets game-winner as Boston grabs 3-1 series lead

MONTREAL – Glen Murray took advantage of Alex Kovalev's mistake to score on a breakaway 9:27 into the second overtime Tuesday night, giving the Boston Bruins a 4-3 win over the Montreal Canadiens.

Boston, which took a 3-1 series lead, tied it when Mike Knuble scored with 30.7 seconds remaining in regulation.

Murray beat goalie Jose Theodore with a wrist shot after Montreal's Kovalev collided with teammate Sheldon Souray in the neutral zone. Kovalev was shaking his hand after appearing to be slashed on the glove and lost sight of the puck – and Souray and Murray.

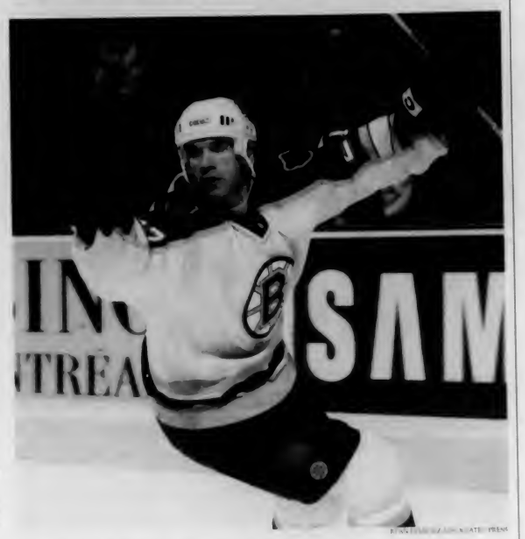
Canadiens	3

Bruins goalie Andrew Raycroft made 42 saves. Theodore stopped 40 shots.

Michael Nylander and Jiri Slegr also scored for Boston, which won its second overtime game of the series. Bruins rookie Patrice Bergeron scored 1:26 into overtime Friday to give Boston a 2-1 home win, its second straight to open the first-round series.

The Bruins can close out the series in Game 5 on Thursday in Boston.

Knuble tied the game in the final minute of the third period, though he had to wait several anxious moments for a video review to award the goal.



Knuble put a backhander past Theodore's left pad from the edge of the crease, though play continued for another eight seconds.

Play was stopped with 22.1 seconds remaining and video

Home runs up, scoring down as MLB releases first-week stats

BY RONALD BLUM
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Home runs were up slightly, scoring was down a smidgeon and attendance soared.

The start of steroid testing with penalties didn't seem to have an effect on sluggers during the first week of the season.

"Steroids and hitting, one has nothing to do with the other," San Francisco outfielder Dustan Mohr said. "Stats are stats. You can't argue with them. Guys should get more credit for the work they do in the off-season rather than someone accusing them of taking shortcuts."

There were 2.22 home runs per game during the first week of the season. That's up 2 percent from the 2.18 average opening week last year but well below the 2.74 in 2000, according to the Elias Sports Bureau, baseball's statistician.

Albert Pujols and Scott Rolen of the St. Louis Cardinals hit four homers each, as did Adam Dunn of the Cincinnati Reds.

"I don't think the steroid situation is going to limit the home runs being hit. The ballpark and the bats are the factors," Dunn said. "If I'm on them, it's not going to make me hit the ball any further, it's not going to make me hit the ball."

One thing's for sure: The controversy over the use of performance-enhancing drugs didn't keep fans away from ballparks, where attendance was at its highest level in three years.

Helped by a new ballpark in San Diego and better weather than last year, average attendance in the first week increased 11 percent to 31,252. That's the largest first-week level since 2001's average of 31,876.

"The end of last season was tremendous, the postseason was spectacular," commissioner Bud Selig said Monday at the opening of Citizens Bank Park in Philadelphia.

"There was a lot of interest in the offseason, the debate about A-Rod," Selig said. "Last year, on Sept. 1, there were 18 teams still in contention. This year, I think it'll be around 20. As I like to say, there's a lot of hope and faith out there."

Baseball still is trying to reach its record average attendance of 31,612, set in 1993, before the 7 1/2-month strike that wiped out the World Series for the first time in 90 years. Last year's average was 28,013.

The New York Yankees averaged 46,700 fans for their first four home games, while Houston — with former Yankees Roger Clemens and Andy Pettitte — averaged 42,300 for its first three.

San Diego had an average of 41,500 for its opening three games in Petco Park, and the Boston Red Sox extended their home sellout streak to 67 games.

The Yankees already have sold 2.98 million tickets and the Red Sox nearly 2.5 million. At the new ballparks, the Phillies have sold 2.3 million and the Padres 2.15 million.

"I think of it as a 10th player," Philadelphia outfielder Doug Glanville said. "You love the feeling of all the people supporting you. It's a lot more enjoyable playing in front of that type of crowd."

As for the scoring, it declined 3 percent, from 10.03 runs per game to 9.71. But the overall major league batting average rose 2 percent, from .261 to .267.

"I don't really worry or keep track of that," Chicago Cubs slugger Sammy Sosa said. "I just try to get ready myself."

Rain, rain go away...

Massachusetts baseball coach Mike Stone, left, and softball coach Elaine Sortino both saw their respective squads' games with UConn postponed due to rain and poor field conditions. The Minutemen will play the game tommorow as part of a doubleheader in Storrs, Conn. beginning at 1 p.m., while the Minutewomen will host the Huskies at the UMass Softball Complex with first pitch slated for 4 p.m.

UM set for dog fight

Minutewomen will travel to face Albany

BY MATT BARSTOW
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Sometime, some game, the tide will turn in favor of UMass. This is the sentiment of Carrie Bolduc, head coach of the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team.

This afternoon, UMass will travel to New York to face Albany where it will attempt to rebound from Sunday's fifth one-goal loss of the season, which came at the hands of George Washington.

At 2-8, it is virtually impossible for UMass to gain an at-large bid to the NCAA tournament. But with a 1-2 record in the Atlantic 10, The Minutewomen are still in contention to make the conference playoffs. If the post-season started today, UMass would be fifth in the conference, one slot shy of the cutoff.

With five games remaining, four inter-divisional, the Maroon and White still has time to overtake Duquesne, Richmond and Temple — three teams sitting one win ahead of UMass at 2-1.

Oddly, the Maroon and White will need outside help to get into the post-season, because three of its remaining games are against teams below UMass in the conference standings. This can be viewed as a double-edged sword.

It means UMass cannot overtake the front-runners outright, but also means the Minutewomen have already faced its toughest competition.

While the conference leaders battle each other, UMass has the opportunity to slip into the top four with wins against 0-2 (A-10) La Salle and St. Josephs.

Today's game at Albany doesn't hold much weight but can help the Minutewoman gain momentum going into Sunday's all-important game against Temple — a game that could result in UMass overtaking the Owls as the fourth and qualifying team for the Atlantic 10 championships.

Despite all these contingencies, UMass still controls its own fate. Things could easily go from bad to worse with a loss at home against Temple, but going into today's game Bolduc chooses to concentrate on the positive.

"We're looking forward to [Albany] to help us prepare for Temple but all games are challenging in spite of records," Bolduc said.

The Great Dames enter the game at 4-6, with losses coming at the hands of Holy Cross and Duquesne — two teams that constitute UMass' sole victories.

"It's good that we've already played some of the better teams, and if we had beaten [George Washington] we obviously would have been in a better situation," Bolduc said. "We have a team understanding that win or loose, Temple will be an important game for us."

Through the first half of the season, UMass has shown flashes of brilliance. One of its wins came against then undefeated and conference leading Duquesne, and two of its losses were decided in overtime.

But for UMass to make a late season surge into the playoffs, it must solidify its goaltending.

This became painfully apparent in Friday's 19-7 loss to Richmond, during which all three goalies saw action, and combined for two saves on 19 shots.

Joey Rubin and Lauren McCarthy combined to allow 15 goals on 15 shots Friday, but also appeared solid while net-minding their respective victories earlier in the season.

McCarthy, a red shirt freshman, began the season as the starter but was replaced by Rubin three games into the season. While Bacaicoa appeared shaky in her first action of the year Friday, she returned on Sunday for a solid 11 save performance.

On Tuesday, Bolduc said, "I haven't named a goalie [to play against] Albany, it all depends on what works best for the team. I was thrilled that [Bacaicoa] made some huge saves in the last couple minutes against GW but I'm feeling confident in all three."

Parental notification may be near passing

BY DAN DUGGAN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The major points of debate at the Student Government Association Senate meeting last night centered around the recent recommendations made by the Alcohol Task Force.

The Amherst campus is close to passing a recommendation by the Alcohol Task Force to notify the parents of students caught in possession of alcohol next year. This recommendation was approved by the Student Affairs Judicial Issues Committee, Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs and Campus Life Michael Gargano, Chancellor John V. Lombardi and President Jack Wilson, and is up for final approval on May 5 when the University of Massachusetts Board of Trustees, votes on it.

Members of the SGA emphasized the need to stop this plan from being instituted. Senator Patrick Higgins said the search for potential underage drinkers could turn into a "witch hunt." Higgins went on to point out that students' parents are not notified in almost every other case in which a student is found to be breaking a law or rule, and stressed that alcohol should not be an exception to this rule.

Other Senate members felt that steps need to be taken to make UMass a safer campus, especially in the wake of last fall's riots in the Southwest residential area.

Senator Timothy Busiere initiated the debate by reading a statement at the beginning of the meeting highlighting a number of instances on campus where alcohol abuse has caused problems.

"Students at UMass should have the right to feel safe," Busiere said. "Yet 15 percent were assaulted and 20 percent admitted to feeling endangered by intoxicated students last year."

Currently the University has a three-strike policy in regards to alcohol: on the first offense a student must pay $50 and attend an alcohol workshop, on the second offense a student must pay $100 and attend the R.E.A.P program, and on the third offense the student is kicked off campus.

In an effort to prevent further rights from being violated, two senators presented a motion to keep students' bags from being checked upon entering the dormitories.

This motion also set off much debate, as some senators said the bag checks would ensure student safety. They cited the use of bag checks at other universities, such as Bridgewater State College, as evidence that this type of security measure can be used effectively.

Other senators said the bag checks would be a violation of student rights and could lead to the further privacy intrusions by the University in the future. They also pointed out that students will assuredly find a way around whatever hours the University decides to do the checking, and therefore this would not curb the amount of drinking taking place on campus.

Another problem with instituting the bag checking would be the high costs to pay for this added security. In his address to the senate, Brian Long made clear who would pay for this service — the students.

Ultimately the Senate voted to pass the motion, which will

Panel presentation highlights pressing UMass and state childcare concerns

Brenda Bushouse (second from right), an assistant professor for the political science department, addresses the panel and audience at "The State and The Status of Childcare: UMass and Beyond," a panel presentation last night in the Campus Center.

BY MICHELLE RIVERA
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A panel presentation led by distinguished faculty last night highlighted concerns and problematic issues in regard to the state and status of child care within Massachusetts and the University of Massachusetts community.

The panel presentation, titled "The State and the Status of Childcare: UMass and Beyond", was moderated by Sandra L. Mandel, the associate director of special events for the Everywoman's Center.

The five UMass faculty panelists consisted of Brenda K. Bushouse, an assistant professor for the political science department, Nancy E. deProsse, the coordinator for Commuter Services' Parent Support Programs, Maryanne Gallagher, the University Child Care Director, Ellen A. Hatch, a researcher for the Childcare Labor Market and Dorothy A. Meyer, the director of the Early Childhood Laboratory School.

According to the panel's press release, the future of the University Child Care at UMass has been in question for the last two years. Recent history suggests that the University is reconsidering its commitment and ability to offer early childhood programming for student and employee parents.

On average, three out of five working families pay an average of 10 percent of their earnings for childcare. In Massachusetts, lower income families pay 20 percent of their income for child care, and more than 6,000 income qualified children are on waiting lists for subsidies.

According to the Early Education For All campaign, a coalition partnered with state legislators and thousands of early educators and parents across the state to make high-quality early education a top priority in Massachusetts, children with high-quality childcare yield extraordinary public return.

"High quality preschool can make a significant difference to the child, the family and the community," said Hatch.

Every $1 invested in a child's early education can return more than $7 to society in increased earnings for participants and reduced costs on special education, welfare, dependency and crime.

"Childcare is not a small part of the market place," said Hatch. "It's an industry that no one talks about, or sees, and they don't acknowledge its economic impact."

Hatch said many Massachusetts preschool teachers' salaries average $22,000 a year, even though they hold a bachelor's or master's degree. These teachers can easily make a better pay at a regular school, she said.

Better qualified and better paid teachers will contribute to higher quality programs, said Hatch.

According to Gallagher, the quality of childcare, affordability for parents and the compensation for teachers must be simultaneously balanced to produce high quality care for children. If one of these falls out of balance, it offsets another.

"For example, high quality and affordability can be great, but teachers' salaries might not be great," said Gallagher.

"Quality is usually the short leg," she said.

All panelists agreed that Massachusetts should take a leadership role with both education and with building better teachers.

Meyer said that connecting with policy makers to fix the problem would be a great start.

The panelists also agreed that childcare should be called "education", and not just "childcare."

"We embrace public education, so why not embrace public education with a child who is at a critical learning stage," Hatch said.

The panel presentation advocating for state and university support comes in the wake of the recent announcement of the closing of the Early Childhood Laboratory School in May of this year.

The event was co-sponsored by the Faculty Senate Council on the Status of Women, the Graduate Women's Network and the Graduate Student Senate.

Calvert to address globalization cons

Tommy Lee Calvert, chief of external operations at the American Anti-Slavery Group, will give a lecture today titled Modern Day Slavery: The Dark Side of Globalization at 2:30 p.m. in room 227of Herter Hall.

Calvert leads the group's awareness, empowerment and advocacy agenda. He not only works to empower survivors of slavery from around the world, he also leads grassroots campaigns, coordinates legislative action and serves as a media representative.

Calvert will speak about the downside of globalization, more specifically the loss of high tech jobs to outsourcing overseas. American information technology companies have been sending jobs overseas to decrease cost and maximize profit. For instance, while a worker overseas would earn $12 per hour, a worker doing the same job in America would earn three times that amount.

According to Calvert, this is not the only dark side to globalization. He will discuss the exploitation of workers overseas, those who work at producing the consumer products to benefit the western world.

Professor Bernie D. Jones' legal studies class, 397 Z, covers the legal history of American slavery, and the law and policy aspects of illegal slavery taking place today. For more information on the event contact Jones at bdjones@legal.umass.edu.

The Departments of Legal Studies, Afro-American Studies, Women's Studies, the Labor Center, the Political Economy and Research Institute are sponsoring Calvert's visit.

Alumni forum encourages students

BY DAN O'BRIEN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Four alumni spoke at the University of Massachusetts Women's Studies and Social Thought and Political Economy departments' alumni and career forum last night, sharing where their career paths have taken them.

The first speaker of the night was Ramon Borges-Mendez, a 1985 STPEC graduate. After graduating from UMass, Borges-Mendez received a PhD in Planning and Labor Economics from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He also worked for Paul Wolfowitz (who is currently the U.S. Deputy Secretary of Defense.) the United Nations and the World Bank.

Borges-Mendez said one of the most important rewards of his education was to be able have an extensive background, which he said gave him flexibility when seeking jobs.

"My advice [is] have some space to wiggle," he said. "I would have had to make important moral and ethical decisions."

He said if he had stayed on his job with the Department of Defense, he might have had to help draft a constitution for Iraq.

"I asked myself, 'do you really want to do that?'" he said.

The second speaker of the night was Sarah Dunton, a 2001 Women's Studies graduate. Her career began as a substitute high school teacher in Nantucket. There, she started a Gay/Straight Alliance, where she said she developed a love for helping others. She said in order to reach out to kids, schools need to be supportive of the teachers.

"If you don't have the support of the school system, you're hitting your head against a brick wall," Dunton said.

Dunton now works as a peer mediation coordinator at Greenfield High School. She said that she appreciates her role in the school, saying that most of the staff has to discipline students, but she is instead able to talk to them on a one-on-one basis.

"It's a dream job," she said. "I get to ask students, 'How are you doing? What's going on?' And I don't have to tell them what to do."

John Pepi, a 1978 STPEC graduate who now works for Office Waste Management and Surplus here at UMass was the third lecturer of the evening. His extensive background included organizing a student union at UMass in the 1970s, working for Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group, the Ralph Nader presidential campaign in 2000 and the 2003 Jill Stein, of the Green Party Massachusetts gubernatorial campaign.

One piece of advice Pepi gave to students was to not underestimate the value of a liberal education.

He said that when he was in college, due to his prospective field he did not need to take classes in mathematics, science, foreign language or literature, which he said he wished he could change.

"I didn't need it then, but now if a [scientist] is explaining a theory, I can't understand it," he said.

The last speaker of the evening was Bonnie Conefrey, a Women's Studies 2001 graduate student. Conefrey said her path to helping others found her working for ACCION USA, the nation's largest non-profit micro-lender, who she still works for today. Micro-lending is the practice of lending money to impoverished people.

She said her interest first began when she studied abroad in Jamaica. Before joining ACCION USA, she worked on a program that loaned money to women from Jamaica, Bangladesh and Zimbabwe.

"The money was meant to empower women to make home improvements and start businesses," she said.

Bush endorses Israel's plan to retain parts of the West Bank

By Barry Schweid
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — In a historic policy shift, President Bush yesterday endorsed Israel's plan to hold on to part of the West Bank in any final peace settlement with the Palestinians. Bush also ruled out Palestinian refugees returning to Israel, bringing strong criticism from the Palestinians.

An elated Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon said his plan to pull back from parts of the West Bank and Gaza, hailed by Bush, would create "a new and better reality for the state of Israel."

But Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia — with whom the Bush administration deals while boycotting leader Yasser Arafat — called Bush "the first president who has legitimized the (Israeli) settlements in Palestinian territories."

"We as Palestinians reject that," Qureia said. "We cannot accept that. We reject it and we refuse it."

Arafat earlier called the idea "the complete end of the peace process." And Palestinian Cabinet minister Saeb Erekat said of Bush's statement: "This is like someone giving a part of Texas' land to China."

"If Israel wants to make peace, it must talk to the Palestinian leadership," Erekat said.

Palestinian leaders had previously said they had been assured by the Bush administration they would be consulted before any endorsement of Sharon's plan.

Bush's statement on settlements "will be read by the Arab world as justification of Sharon's sovereignty over major (settlement) blocs," Edward S. Walker, a former U.S. ambassador to Israel and to Egypt, said in an interview.

Previous U.S. administrations have described Jewish settlements as obstacles to peace. One of Bush's predecessors, Jimmy Carter, went even further and called them illegal.

A senior Israeli official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Sharon thought that no American president had ever made concessions so important to Israel as Bush did yesterday.

Sharon, in gaining Bush's backing of his unilateral plan to withdraw all Jewish settlers and military installations from Gaza and from some areas of the West Bank, offered several concessions in a letter to Bush.

The Israeli leader said he would limit the growth of Jewish settlements and remove all unauthorized outposts on the West Bank. And Sharon said a security fence Israel is building to deter Palestinian attacks was "temporary rather than permanent."

Also, Sharon renewed his commitment to the so-called road map for peacemaking backed by the United States but said the Palestinian Authority had failed to stop terror and to reform its security service.

Bush called Sharon's plan historic and urged Palestinians to match Israel's "boldness and courage."

SGA debates recommendations

send a message to the University that they will not accept bag checks as a measure to combat alcohol use in the dorms.

An issue that was welcomed by all senators and serves as good news to students is the increase in money UMass will receive from the state in next year's budget.

Yesterday was an important day for lobbying at the State House in Boston, and it appears to have paid off, as UMass was promised $384.6 million by the State Ways and Means Committee for next year. This signals an increase of $21 million from the money UMass receives from the state this year.

President Jared Nokes said that 300 letters were sent to the State House on Friday lobbying for more money for UMass. Nokes said this support was helpful in getting UMass additional money for next year.

The senate approved a loan of $15,000 to the university productions department for upcoming events. This loan will help pay for the appearance of comedian David Cross who is due to perform at the Fine Arts Center on either May 7 or 8.

The Senate also approved Nokes appointing Maggie McNally as Secretary of Finance until the results of the next SGA election are approved in early May.

"She'll be the only one I appoint," Nokes told The Massachusetts Daily Collegian after the meeting last night.

The rest of Nokes' executive board is made up a few assistants Nokes has hired, he said.

Stability in Iraq far from a reality

Day by day, more harrowing news comes from Iraq. A conflict that is now over a year old has produced few results, other than the jingoistic banner that was Saddam Hussein's capture. Even worse, it has become a confusing, dangerous firestorm that has gone beyond the military.

In recent months, a frightening trend has become the reality in Iraq. Civilians from all over the world — from the four American contractors whose bodies are in the process of identification, to the French television journalist who was released after four days in captivity — have become the targets of violent acts, including kidnapping and outright brutal murder.

To say that there is chaos in Iraq is unnecessary, but the brutal details are funneled back to us every day. The American contractors are simply the latest and highest-profile victims of anti-foreigner violence in Iraq. There is some confusion between the U.S. Government, which puts the number of foreigners in captivity at 40, and the Associated Press, which is only reporting 21 kidnap victims.

Despite the number disagreement, one point stands firm: neither does the United States, nor any other occupying country, have any control over what is going on in the war-torn nation. As President George W. Bush preaches that, "we must not waver" from stabilization efforts in Iraq, the lives of the civilians who are actually carrying out the order are being put into undue peril.

Of course, the military in Iraq has suffered plenty of attrition as well. 604 soldiers have been killed in action since May 1, 2003, and 535 of those are American. May 1, of course, was the day that Mr. Bush stood on the deck of the USS Abraham Lincoln to address the troops and the nation, with a giant banner reading "Mission Accomplished" displayed across the aircraft carrier's control tower.

The recent rash of civilian-targeted violence is simply a bolder, more relatable sign that the conflict in Iraq is anything but over, and the U.S. hasn't accomplished much of anything, beyond the removal of Hussein. That soldiers should be fearful for their lives is commonplace. That civilians should be worriedly looking over their shoulders at every passing car and every sideways glance just shows that we have gone too far, too soon, without any real finality granted to the war, which Bush called "one victory in the war on terrorism."

The civilians who go to Iraq to join in the rebuilding efforts should understand the danger in their actions, certainly. But to suggest that the area is approaching anything resembling "stable" is a foolhardy conclusion, and the half-hearted ramblings of Mr. Bush's recent press conferences only serve as a reminder that underneath the veneer of justice that the Bush Administration has created lies a trembling volcano of violence, just waiting to explode.

Information from the Boston Globe, New York Times, CNN, and the Associated Press was used in this editorial.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of the Massachusetts Daily Collegian Editorial Board.

Why we will fail in Iraq

The debate on Iraq continues to obscure and ignore the obvious — no country can colonize another without resistance. And by resistance, I mean violent resistance.

Rene Gonzalez

Nobody should be surprised by a regular civilian mob brutally lynching four American mercenaries working for Blackwater USA. Frantz Fanon (in The Wretched of the Earth) taught us that the psychology of the colonized would force them to manifest their anger and humiliation in violent ways. What occurred in Fallujah was the logical outcome of a people oppressed, angered, humiliated and feeling powerless to evict the foreign interlopers in their midst. Would we act any different if we were colonized?

The problem in Iraq is not that the Iraqis are ungrateful, or that they're Baathist "dead-enders," terrorists or religious fundamentalists fighting us. The problem is one of ideological misconceptions and an unwillingness to admit reality and truth. Ideology is what fuels this war. It's the combined interests and ideology of neoconservatives (who wish for a U.S. imperial status), greedy corporate executives (who lust for the Iraqi oil), coupled with a general American consent to warfare as a tool to impose American political visions on other nations. Only this unholy concoction of ideologies could explain the frat-boy provocation of President Bush, when he called for the Iraqi insurgents to "Bring it on." Bring it on they did, and we have over 600 U.S. soldiers dead and thousands wounded to prove it.

The first step toward admitting reality is exposing the lies that justified the war. There were no Weapons of Mass Destruction, and even if they did have them, that's not a justification for war against a country. Many countries have WMDs, and we don't invade them. Iraq was no threat to us — it didn't have the missile delivery technology to reach beyond Israel, Iran, Kuwait, or Turkey, let alone Europe or the United States. Its army was no match for our professional army, nor it could threaten us. Why did President Bush and the rest of the administration tried to fool us that Iraq was a threat?

The justification that we invaded Iraq to rid the Iraqis of Saddam Hussein was purely for "domestic consumption." It was a feel-good balm for our uneasy consciences. The irony and hypocrisy of justifying a war on the removal of a tyrannical and brutal dictator that had been our "bed-buddy" for over 20 years was not lost on the rest of the world (although the American public fell for it).

The golden moments of American hypocrisy must have been Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Secretary of State Colin Powell's principled denunciations of Saddam's very real crimes against humanity, while conveniently hiding the fact that the United States knew of those crimes when they occurred, and continued to funnel billions of dollars in financial, military, and political aid to the Hussein regime. Rumsfeld himself has been videotaped shaking the hand of Hussein in the 1980s.

In fact, many times, possible civilian coups against Saddam Hussein were brutally repressed by Hussein with the aid of the American C.I.A, which informed Hussein of the coups before they were ready to threaten him. The American government signed the death warrants of thousands of Iraqi civilians for the crime of attempting to overthrow Hussein. And then, we are supposed to really believe that the U.S. had nothing but pure intentions in the Iraqi war?

What about the Al-Qaeda "boogeyman"? U.S. administration officials, all the way up to President Bush, used every dictionary and thesaurus term for "threat" to scare the American public into thinking that Saddam Hussein was in league with Al-Qaeda. Only this truth explains why 60 percent of the American public thought that Saddam Hussein was behind 9-11. At the end of the day, after the war was ongoing and the justification was no longer needed, it was conveniently discarded by Secretary of State Colin Powell and President Bush in speeches admitting that there was no Al-Qaeda link to Saddam Hussein. Sad to say, but the American public was bamboozled just as badly as the German nation was bamboozled by Hitler, when he ascribed blame for German problems to Jews and other social dissidents.

We tried to colonize them, and they are killing us for it.

Finally, what about the "bringing democracy" justification? At the end of the day, the American colonial occupiers have censored newspapers, shot at peaceful Iraqi demonstrations, broken down doors and searched Iraqi families, tried to institute an "elites-only" style of caucus-elections democracy and ruled Iraq from behind large concrete walls. The only person in Iraq that deserves the credit for fighting for "direct elections" is Ayatollah Ali Sistani, who has used his religious authority to press the U.S. administration to discard their previous, elitist "democratic" ideas. From a point of view of history, it wasn't the U.S., which pushed for "democracy" in Iraq; it was Iraqis themselves, who demanded "direct elections" in opposition to American political plans.

Flash forward to the present. Sunni Muslims in the "Sunni Triangle" have been making us pay dearly for our colonial arrogance. Then, Paul Bremer provokes Muqtada Al-Sadr and his "Mahdi Army" of Shi'ite followers into open rebellion by closing down a newspaper that had a circulation rate of, at most, 10,000. Now, Sunnis and Shi'ites are against us, with the possibility that the rest of the peaceful population will take sides with them. And, somehow, we cannot understand why people are shooting at us instead throwing flowers at us for "liberating them."

It's pretty simple: what the U.S. is facing in Iraq is a genuine, nationalist, patriotic, Iraqi rebellion against colonial rule. It is no longer relevant that we think of ourselves as liberators or that our troops feel themselves justified in being in Iraq. What matters now is that the Iraqi people have taken up arms against us, which makes the situation a colonial-national liberation struggle. In those terms, we are the colonizers and they the freedom fighters. Our heroes become U.S. colonial soldiers. The terrorists become Iraqi patriots. And Operation Iraqi Freedom becomes Operation Failed Colonial Attempt.

This is why we will fail in Iraq. Because, only we remain fooled. For the Iraqis and the rest of the world, the matter is clear. They will massacre, machete, shoot, bomb, burn, drag and castrate every American soldier they get their hands on until we learn that supreme basic law: do onto others what you would want them to do unto you. We tried to colonize them, and they are killing us for it. We can ratchet up our murder against Iraqis and try to repress the uprising (which would only dig the colonial hole deeper), or we can admit defeat in this colonial adventure and withdraw. In other words, we can be in Iraq for 10 more years and make it another Vietnam, or we can do a "Saigon" and bolt from Iraq. Now.

We need to stop the "patriotic" whitewashing of the truth. The propaganda has it backwards: Iraq is their country and we are the colonial interlopers. We can no longer try to dictate what is right and wrong to Iraqis. We should withdraw from Iraq ... or face a national liberation struggle that will be impossible to stop.

UMass' real men of genius

Matt Brochu

The average college student's life revolves around one thing. Some might say class. Others might say sex. But I say it's beer.

The average under-aged college guy will go through $40 and a homeless man to get it. The average college girl will drink beer that tastes like crap (Michelob Ultra) to negate the belly-fattening effects of it. The average college transsexual will frequent the nonexistent unisex bathrooms more often because of it. And the average college student's baby (which must now wash dishes at the Dining Common to pay for its own daycare) is probably the direct result of it. For these reasons, the average Collegian columnist should write a column based on a commercial about it.

I'm sure you've seen the "Bud Light Presents: Real Men of Genius" ads on TV. Over the last few years, we've all fallen in love with Mr. Too-Much-Cologne-Wearer and Mr. Nudist-Colony-Activity-Coordinator. But, come to think of it, UMass has men of genius too, and I plan on pointing out just a couple. Readers' note: 1) If you haven't seen or heard these commercials then download them immediately, 2) Words within the parentheses indicate outbursts from that amazingly talented backup singer.

UMass presents, "Real Men of Genius" (Real Men of Genius!). Today we salute you, Mr. College-Hockey-Away-Game-Goer (Mr. College-Hockey-Away-Game-Goer!). Armed with your team's hockey jersey, and a hat too, just in case we didn't get the point, you travel with your only three friends to the Mullins Center on a Friday night to get booed by our drunken student body (Went to the prom with your cousin!). Sure you could be doing better things: watching the game on TV, listening to the game on the radio, or sleeping in your hockey jersey (Wet dreams!), but no, you choose to brave the cold and ridicule to cheer for a team full of guys that have no idea you even exist (No f—ing clue!). So take pride in being a loser, Mr. College-Hockey-Away-Game-Goer. Although your team may have the game in the bag, when you pull into your school's parking lot at 1 a.m., we will already be half in the bag.

Today we salute you, Mr. Got-Pulled-Over-in-Front-of-the-Horseshoe-Driver (Mr. Got-Pulled-Over-in-Front-of-the-Horseshoe-Driver). Anyone can get bagged on the highway, but you somehow manage to get pulled over on a street decked out in flashing signs, useless over-extended yellow curbs and a squad car on duty 75 percent of the time (Another one bites the dust!). You may have laughed at those sorry, ticket-receiving-letta-easy-girls many times before (You've slept with them too!), but tonight you had a date to impress, and a fast car to impress her with (Sweet Ford Taurus!). So give Officer Ting your license and registration, Mr. Got-Pulled-Over-in-Front-of-the-Horseshoe-Driver, for you clearly didn't have the window side of the Z-room freshmen year. Because if you had, you would've seen time and time again that Ting makes Bruce Lee look like, well, my backup singer (You better recognize!).

Today we salute you, Mr. Roommate-Who-Never-Leaves-the-Room (Mr. Roommate-Who-Never-Leaves-the-Room!). With a wardrobe that says, "I have no life," and a closet funk that says, "I have no soap," (Plug it in, plug it in!), you've decided to double major in Whipped-phone-calls-to-long-distance-girlfriend and Snood (Just register the damn thing!). Sure, if you went outside you might actually enjoy your freshmen year, but without your presence, we'd be able to eat crackers without worrying about your weird allergic reaction to wheat, and hook up without your frustrated sighs from the top bunk (Sleep in the freaking hallway!). So keep saying, "No, YOU hang up," to that annoying girl, Mr. Roommate-Who-Never-Leaves-the-Room, because if you keep eating our Easy Mac, your cell phone's going in the toilet.

Today we salute you, Mr. Crappy-College-Band-Lead-Singer (Mr. Crappy-College-Band-Lead-Singer!). Jumping up and down like a freaking bumble ball, your almost-transvestite voice deprives us drunk students of what we really want to hear at the bars: real music ... by real bands (Play that new Sean Paul joint!). It's true, 13-year-old girls throw their training bras on stage every time you play "More Than Words," (Statutory Smuud!), but who needs chicks when you've got two drumsticks autographed by Simple Plan ... and a really cheesy lip ring (TRL, watch out!). So sing that punk song about the girlfriend who dumped your ass again, Mr. Crappy-College-Band-Lead-Singer, because these chicks don't even know the name of your band ... and they never will, because your band sucks, and so do you.

Today we salute you, Wingniece (Wrong beer commercial!). Cue guitar ... Sun bathing chicks may look imposing in the Horseshoe / But when it comes to saying, "How you doin'?" there are no rules (Or clothes!). Hey, wrong song. I don't need a backup singer for this one (My bad!). But the best pick-up line isn't one that you can say / Just pick up your toddler niece and walk on over their way. The lady oasis may be dry for days or weeks / until she flaunts that little diaper and those pudgy cheeks. Girls will flock from all over just to see her / and when she takes a nap, you can buy them a beer. Wingnieeeece.

So crack open an ice cold Bud Light, UMass Men of Genius, because you give genius a face, and without that, we wouldn't know who to make fun of on a daily basis.

'Are you looking at me, swan?"

Gilad Skolnick

They are so lonely, so alone, and mistreated by everyone. How many of you have neglected them? I bet you're guilty of it, you selfish person. Chances are, you don't even care.

They're abused, tormented, and laughed at. But they're beautiful and every bit as much a part of UMass as you or I — perhaps more so by some accounts. Do you really know them? Have you even taken the time to feed them or talk to them?

Our campus pond is the home of two trumpeter swans. They have to go through a lot every year, and you don't even say hi. What nerve! Freezing-cold, foodless weather in the winter and scorching heat in the summer is just the beginning.

Every spring and fall, hundreds of rude, noisy Canadian geese have the chutzpah to in-vade the pond and make it their temporary resting place. Ill-tempered and constantly squawking, they're not much different than the people in the country from which they come. Crowding around the pond, the Canadian geese are not pleasant company.

Every spring and fall hundreds of rude, noisy Canadian geese have the chutzpah to invade the pond and make it their temporary resting place. Ill-tempered and constantly squawking, they're sadly not much different than the people in the country from which they come.

For years, a sturdy old mute swan by the name of Sidney inhabited the UMass pond, until he passed away in 1998. Fellow students who are still here remember him as spoiled and violent. But those who knew the real Sidney remember that once you got to know him, he was a lot kinder. Sure he would violently hiss and peck at all those who came near him, demanded to be put indoors in the winter and had an attitude problem. But he never said a mean thing and was outgoing and optimistic.

Around 1998, with the passing of Sydney, four new swans were brought to UMass. One died and another was kidnapped, which left the two present swans in the pond. Some sensitive students have complained that the swans are aggressive, alleging that the birds flap their wings, give mean looks and threaten to bite those who approach. However, I think the swans have a right to be a bit suspicious after what happened to their fellow pond mates. Also, the fact that the pond is nestled between the two most hideous buildings the world has ever seen — the Fine Arts Center and the Campus Center, makes it even worse.

Just to make sure that the swans don't consider leaving UMass for cleaner ponds — such as the one by Mount Holyoke College or the evil University of New Hamp-shire campus pond — UMass took the liberty of clipping their wings. I'm sure they didn't enjoy flying anyway. Why fly when you can walk?

Aside from abuse from humans, Canadians, and Canadian geese, our campus swans are sexually frustrated. Swans like their privacy when they mate, much like humans, and with the hustle and bustle of our busy campus during each and every season, who can blame them? So either they've been very patient for some privacy for the past few years, or the two remaining swans are both the same gender, or perhaps there is just no swan chemistry. Either way, there must be some frustration; one can only feel sympathy for them.

So come spend time with the swans. Talk to them or sing to them. Perhaps even come feed them — I'm sure they'd enjoy a piece of fresh bread, an aquatic beetle or even a snail. The UMass swan is the only way to go.

STUDYING ABROAD

EXPLORE THIS GROWING TREND

By Glen Straub

There is something very exploratory about going away to college for the average young American. For many, it's the chance to leave their quintessential American town with their quintessential American family, their quintessential American friends and quintessential American high school.

It's an opportunity to meet new people, become intellectually enlightened, build an amazing metabolism for alcohol and realize there is greater world out there than just (fill in the blank).

But for others, universities and colleges in the Unites States are just not enough. The journey must continue. There is an even greater world out there, but what is the best way to experience it?

Enter the growing trend: studying abroad.

Recently, attending universities overseas is so common in the ultimate college experience it can be compared to beers and wings. Opportunities are increasing each year to attend schools or participate in programs on every continent. American schools are linking themselves

WHERE'S YOUR ADVENTURE?

IRELAND

I wish I'd never gone to Galway. I wish I'd never walked down Quay Street at 8 o'clock in the morning, enrapt by the sounds of the city's sunrise, a soundtrack layered with the gravelly, bottomless-brogue shouts of deliverymen, heard above an instrumental of empty kegs rattling in the backs of passing trucks, and a single violin, played by an always cheery-looking fellow, certainly not for the coins I'd toss in his case as I walked by.

Wish I'd never set my alarm for half-seven (7:30 a.m.) most mornings, just to take that stroll. I wish I hadn't walked to class along the River Corrib — which runs in through the city from Galway Bay, past the Salmon Weir Bridge and under the shadow of Galway Cathedral — and seen that lone seal bounding its way upstream, callous to the current. Wish that woman hadn't approached me to mention the Irish legend that says seals shed their skin at night and become human, searching the city for love.

I wish I'd never gone to my European history class, always hoping to get a front row seat for professor Gearóid Ó Tuathaigh, who nearly made learning about World War II as entertaining as sitting in Monroe's Pub, cheering for Ireland's best footballers in its 2004 Euro Cup Qualifying match against Switzerland.

Wish I still called it "soccer." I wish I didn't know that when I saw a Guinness Quality Team vehicle outside of a pub, they were inside checking for consistent dispense temperatures, clean beer lines and correctly cleaned glasses, so that no matter where I ordered my favorite stout in Ireland, it'd be just as perfect as the pint served in the Gravity Bar, which sits atop the Guinness Factory in Dublin.

Wish the first day I got back from Galway, I told the man at the package store "thank you" after he gave me my change, instead of "cheers, lad."

I wish I'd never left.

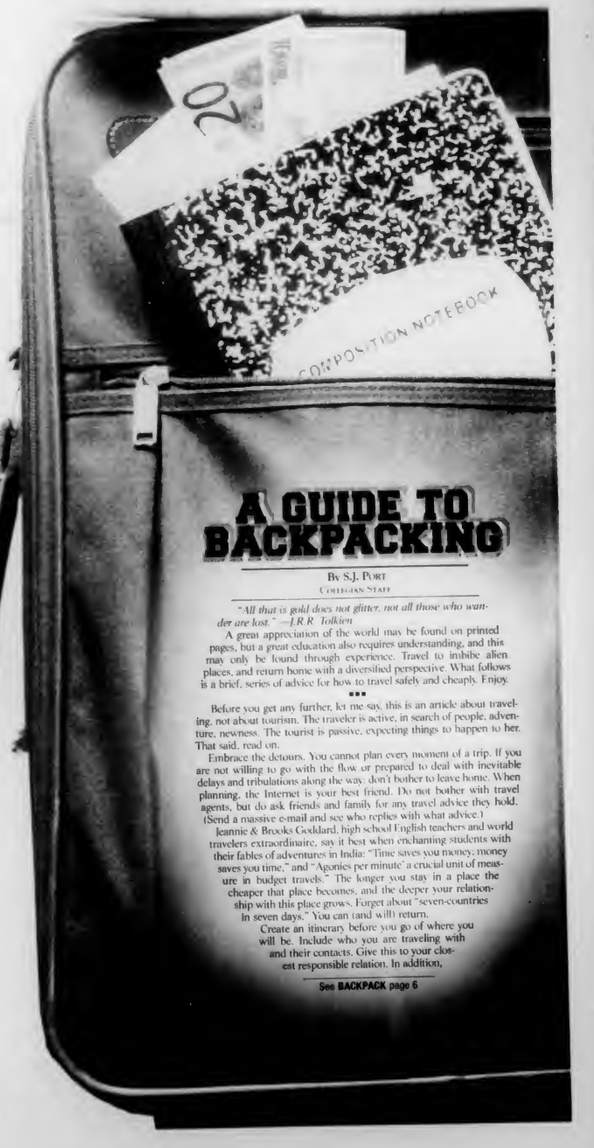
SOUTH AFRICA

The goal for most tourists when they travel to South Africa or any sub-Saharan African nation for that matter is to see the Big Five i.e. the leopard, elephant, lion, buffalo and rhino but, myself, I had my own Big Five while studying in Cape Town, South Africa.

1. THE TOWNSHIPS
At the University of Cape Town, a program called SHAWCO allowed me to work one-on-one with students from the Kensington township. As any thriving journalist would (or should) do, I assisted high school students in creating a newsletter for their impoverished community.

2. THE SOCIAL ATMOSPHERE
South Africa is known for the 50 years of the apartheid regime. Being a young American living in a once institutionalized racist country, it is interesting to observe another nation still with open wounds from a racist system that only ended 10 years ago.

3. TABLE MOUNTAIN
One of the most unique land structures I have ever seen in my life. It's name speaks for itself as the top is completely flat and the mountain spans the entire city of Cape Town. And when you get to the top (as I finally did my last week there) it is surreal seeing both sides of the city — the white-dominated affluent beach area and the shantytowns of the Cape Flats.



GLEN STRAUB/COLLEGIAN

4. THE MUSIC
Paul Simon's "Graceland" won a Grammy for a reason — he went to South Africa to learn the music before he recorded the album.

5. THE GREENS
Where else can you get 2.2 pounds of 'grass' for 40 American dollars? The animals are cool, but go to South Africa and check out the real scene.

A GUIDE TO BACKPACKING

By S.J. Port
Collegian Staff

"All that is gold does not glitter, not all those who wander are lost." —J.R.R. Tolkien

A great appreciation of the world may be found on printed pages, but a great education also requires understanding, and this may only be found through experience. Travel to inhibe alien places, and return home with a diversified perspective. What follows is a brief, series of advice for how to travel safely and cheaply. Enjoy.

Before you get any further, let me say, this is an article about traveling, not about tourism. The traveler is active, in search of people, adventure, newness. The tourist is passive, expecting things to happen to her. That said, read on.

Embrace the detours. You cannot plan every moment of a trip. If you are not willing to go with the flow or prepared to deal with inevitable delays and tribulations along the way, don't bother to leave home. When planning, the Internet is your best friend. Do not bother with travel agents, but do ask friends and family for any travel advice they hold. (Send a massive e-mail and see who replies with what advice.)

Jeannie & Brooks Goddard, high school English teachers and world travelers extraordinaire, say it best when enchanting students with their fables of adventures in India: "Time saves you money, money saves you time," and "Agonies per minute' a crucial unit of measure in budget travels." The longer you stay in a place the cheaper that place becomes, and the deeper your relationship with this place grows. Forget about "seven-countries in seven days." You can (and will) return.

Create an itinerary before you go of where you will be. Include who you are traveling with and their contacts. Give this to your closest responsible relation. In addition, copy all of your cards (credit, ATM, Student ID, license etc.) and your passport and leave this with the itinerary, in case an item is lost and you must prove something.

See BACKPACK page 6

Take Robert Louis Stevenson's advice, "The best we can find in our travels is an honest friend." Make sure you know what your companions' goals for the trip are before you begin. While travelling, open your mouth and speak: talk to everyone you can. You will meet incredible people along the way, you will also meet incredible con-artists — keep your wits about you and trust your gut.

The farther in advance you can buy tickets, the cheaper they will be. Use the Internet to do this. Check Web sites from the countries you are traveling to, they often have different deals for hotels and airfares than American based Web sites.

Make every trip a circle so that you leave from the same airport which you arrived at. This will save you from expensive open-jaw plane fairs. Travel trade routs that are commonly flown. Flying into the busiest or largest airport is also usually cheapest. Sometimes taking a "puddle jumper" or smaller plane (esp. in western Europe) to Venice once landed at Frankfurt from across the bigger [Atlantic] pond, is cheaper than flying directly to Venice. Consider "bucket shops" for plane fares. Use student discounts, and rack up air miles.

Keep in mind that currently, the dollar is not strong. Exchange rates will raise or drop the cost of your travels dramatically depending on where you head. The South African rand is worth less than the dollar; however, getting to South Africa is much more expensive than getting to London. When planning, write it all down, make a chart and look at the numbers. Travel is incredible no matter the destination. Go where you can afford to make the most of it.

"Stay in cheap hotels, then abandon them immediately to lurk about at exotic, luxurious hotels ... hotels are for sleeping only," the Goddards recommend, and, "Remember that a well-timed splurge can revive the spirit."

Travel light; vanity is inefficient. Consider carefully what you are taking but don't obsess, you can buy clothing everywhere. Your best bet is to take (depending on climate and your itinerary) one trendy/club/bar outfit, one church/dress-up/preppy outfit, two casual, comfortable every day outfits. In some countries you will need a conservative (upper arms, and knees covered) to visit religious sites. Do not bring jeans. Jeans (unless a Ivira brand) stretch out easily, are heavy and bulky, and do not dry easily. There is a reason you image great travelers in khakis — they go everywhere. They are light and dry quickly.

"Be bold, adventurous, and resolute when approaching bathrooms," the Goddards advise. Always carry toilet paper! Other potential lifesavers are baggies, gum, wet n' dries or hygienic gel in a bottle. Sunscreen and moisturizer should not be undervalued and can be extremely expensive in other countries.

Always carry $100 U.S. secretly stashed away somewhere on you. As weak as Bush's dollar is, it has symbolic power.

Keep a journal or ledger while you travel! Save paper memorabilia and construct a scrapbook when you get home, take pictures and buy postcards.

Develop the following skills: ability to sleep in any position, ability to enter a bathroom without breathing, patience and humor in the face of bureaucracy and incompetence.

Get an international student identity card off the international web site — the American Web site and STA Travel is more expensive. The "Lonely Planet" Web site and books are an excellent source of advice for traveling within budgetary constraints.

If you travel in the summer — the most expensive time to travel — stay in University dormitories! If you stay in hostels, book ahead, and make sure they have a locked space or lockers to leave your luggage in while you sleep — lest you wish to wake and wonder which roommate walked off with your belongings.

Take the train or bus, and bike and walk, instead of renting a car — unless you are a master of the standard transmission (as I am proud to say I have become) and think you can drive with the gear shift on the left, on the left side of the road, on lanes that are five feet wide but two ways, without having a heart attack. Add to this that your American auto insurance is useless overseen.

However, if you do rent a car in Europe, and have a credit card with more than a $2,500 limit, call their information line and ask if they provide (for free) any kind of traveler's insurance or traveler's auto insurance. Master Cards and some visas include World Wide Auto insurance up to $50,000 — this will give you some peace of mind, as well as save you money on your rental. Do not drive in cities, period.

Whether you drive, or walk, make sure you have a good map. Some cities are better at marking streets than others. In the country talk to locals and prepare ahead for "wandering" (a.k.a. "lost") time.

As with all credit card and ATM usage, before leaving home, contact a representative at each and have them note on your account when you will be using the card abroad. Otherwise, they may assume the card stolen and put a hold on it until they can contact you.

Don't assume that taking money from a foreign ATM machine will cost you an arm and a leg. Check with your bank ahead of time. It costs less for me to take monies from the Ulster Bank in Ireland with my small- hometown-bank card than it does to take monies from the Fleet ATM here Massachusetts.

The first few times you travel, it is a good idea to keep a daily log of costs. This way the next time you travel you will have a better idea of how much to bring and how much you will spend ... It will surprise you how much it costs and how you can save money as well.

Stay with the natives if you can. If you have a long lost cousin in France write them a letter and ask to visit. Wouldn't you be excited to host your long lost French cousin at your home in return? Not only will It save you money; you will be embraced by the very country and culture you are visiting.

Never travel without a watch.

All individuals should wear a watch so that you can split up and do your own thing and meet at the appropriate time. Don't assume there will be clocks around — the Greeks, especially live a slower life and do not care for time constraints.

Sleeping at airports is not as scary as it sounds. Many other people will be there in the same situation.

Bring a book or two, especially any literature that can enhance your time, or remove you completely for a few moments, from your third class cabin.

In closing: "All journeys have secret destinations of which the traveler is unaware." (Martin Buber).

All journeys have secret costs of which the traveler will soon become aware. Travel is an investment."

WHERE'S YOUR ADVENTURE?

SOUTHEAST ASIA

COURTESY KATHRYN LOCONTE

Life in Southeast Asia is a mixture of gold and dirt. Shining, bejeweled palaces sit aside temples of crumbling brick and stucco. Buddhas of stone and jade pose proudly in dingy cities. Chinese and Hindu temples, illuminated in brightness, are side-by-side with 7-Elevene.

On the opposite side of the world, lay opposite places and people. The countries of Thailand, Malaysia and Singapore are defined in part by the rich sense of religion that permeates every place, from the smallest town to the largest of capital cities. For one month last summer, I got to experience this.

Taxi drivers beep at temples as they race by. People kneel in front of mini shrines on the side of congested city roads. Women working at McDonald's wear Muslim headscarves that match their uniforms. Superstition is a way of life. No pointing your feet towards the Buddha and businesses with "lucky" in the name are not uncommon.

It's an existence of new and old, where the tallest skyscrapers stretch and the oldest relics survive, where parties rage and people tend to rice fields. It's a place on the other half of the world, a place that should be experienced by all.

ITALY

Last spring I was fortunate enough to spend five months in Florence, Italy, as part of the Syracuse University study abroad program. It was unequivocally the best time of my life.

Each and every day I was exposed to beautiful art and architecture by simply walking down the street. The food was amazing, the wine was delicious, the people were friendly, and the women were beautiful. Best of all, in Italy, everything moved a little slower than it does here. There was not only time to enjoy these things, but to savor them as well. I think this attitude is best exemplified by the love that Italians have for food.

Undoubtedly, one of my favorite experiences, among many, was participating in a traditional five course, three hour dinner. This type of meal was as much about eating as it was relaxing and enjoying the pleasures of good food and good company. Life doesn't get much better than that — and life doesn't get much better than in Italy.

WHERE'S YOUR ADVENTURE?

CHILE

I attended the Catholic University of Valparaiso in Valparaiso, Chile under the International Study Abroad Program at Butler University. Valparaiso is an old, historical coastal town an hour and a half north of Santiago. It is half constructed on the plain of the jagged coast and half built up on extensive hills. The windy roads up in the hills are filled with colorful houses, Viennese coffee shops, old sailor bars, and hidden hot spots.

COURTESY OF MEGAN ALLEN

Artists from all over the country flock to this city, as it is the artistic mecca of Chile. The nightlife is ridiculously rowdy. Valparaiso is a crowded industrial city, however, so if you are looking to lay out or surf on the beautiful beaches, they are only minutes away in the twin city of Vina del Mar. Vina del Mar is the best beach town in Chile. It is a bit more upscale and has less historical roots, but the enormous sand dunes, beautiful parks, and horseback riding offers a less urban and congested experience. The work at the University is conducted solely in Spanish and you are required to take two advanced Spanish classes and three regular university classes.

The Spanish in Chile is one of the hardest to learn in all of Latin America. Chileans use slang often and speak with an accent very unique to the area. Chile is the wealthiest country in Latin America and because of this, the experience in this country is drastically different than that of other nations. I lived with a Chilean host family for my entire stay and this experience was beneficial beyond words. They were an amazing addition to my experience and I recommend having a family life if you were to try and learn another language. Chile is very easy to travel around because the bus system is excellent and very cheap. Going to Latin America is one of the most culturally rich and wonderful experiences a student can have, and I highly recommend it!

GREAT BRITAIN

Not even six hours had passed after my flight touched down at Heathrow Airport when I had my first near-death experience in London. A motorcyclist, clearly more concerned with getting to his destination rather than worrying about the stupid American about to walk into oncoming traffic, nearly scattered my limbs across Cromwell Road. It's no wonder one in seven pedestrians hit in London are Americans.

But once you actually begin to look to your right first before crossing the street, and once you get the hang of the first floor being the "ground floor" and a line being a "queue," London becomes a great, friendly place to live.

The London Internship Program allowed me to take only two classes, and gave my fellow comrades and I terrific work experiences — as well as enough cultural experiences to last a lifetime. I honestly couldn't tell you one thing I learned in the insipid "World of Work" course I was forced to slave through, but I could rattle off dozens of awesome nights I had and plenty of wonderful people I met.

Basically, if you're thinking about studying abroad for strictly a great academic experience, you're in it for the completely wrong reason.

up with foreign schools every semester to make sure that their respective student bodies take advantage of the once in a lifetime opportunity.

And students at the University of Massachusetts are getting involved in the act as well.

"There are over 700 students that are currently studying or who have studied in a foreign country this academic year," said Carol Lebold, a program director at the International Programs Office. "Some stay for a year or short-term but most stay for a semester."

"A lot of our students go directly through UMass; some do external programs and there are faculty-led programs as well."

According to Lebold, there is at least one UMass student on every continent this semester.

But what's most popular?

It has been the countries in the Western world that have dominated the destinations for American students. And it's the English-speaking nations taking in the most students from the States.

"All countries in the United Kingdom really attract our students," Lebold said. "Not too many people have taken a second language, so it is a safe way to go to school in a foreign country."

Another English-speaking nation though has sparked the interest of a large number of American students and that is 'the land down under,' Australia.

"It has grown to become a national trend to go to Australia and here we have people always coming in and asking about the options for Australia," Lebold said.

However, Lebold encourages students to step out of a comfortable element and try studying in a country in a place uncommon to American tourists.

There are fantastic places with fantastic educational experiences [that only a few students are traveling to] like, amongst others, Ghana, Tanzania and Senegal," Lebold said.

"THERE ARE OVER 700 STUDENTS THAT ARE CURRENTLY STUDYING OR WHO HAVE STUDIED IN A FOREIGN COUNTRY THIS ACADEMIC YEAR."

The biggest issue plaguing the study abroad trend though is the price tag on the experience. According to Lebold, study abroad fees and rising tuition has stifled more students from capturing this glorious opportunity. But through financial aid and attempts to build scholarships more programs are trying to lower their prices.

"It is really tough with all the fees but it's possible to have the experience of a lifetime on any budget," Lebold said. "It all depends on the place you choose for your journey."

'Eve' has a wicked good time at a Boston Red Sox game

Q: I have been seeing this guy for a few months now, and my feelings are growing stronger the more we see each other. He said from the beginning that he doesn't want a committed relationship, and I understood. But now I am starting to want more, and he hasn't changed his decision. Why doesn't he want to commit?
-G.B.

A: Not ready for a commitment in guy language means: I don't want to commit until I find the girl I want to commit to. It's not that difficult. He obviously does not appreciate you enough to be your boyfriend, and therefore is not worth your time. Try not to see him as often, and start dating other guys. See how he reacts when he realizes that you have suddenly slipped away.

Q: I am a really shy guy when it comes to girls. I am never bold enough to ask them out, but somehow I end up in relationships. I am single now, and there is one girl who has occupied my attention recently. What can a shy guy like me do to get the girl? -J.L.

A: Every female would be incredibly flattered to be pursued by someone. It doesn't matter if you are out of her league, a lesser person, or unlikable. Whoever you may be, just know that pursuit is one of the main characteristics women crave for in men. Go to her, talk nicely to her, ask her out, and take her out. If she says no, try again. I believe if you try hard enough, you can have anything or anyone if you set your mind to it. Just get a little more gutsy and you should try to get over the shyness because you might miss out on something wonderful.

Original Sin

Eve

I believe I am at a point where I can admit an unspoken truth. An embarrassing truth that most girls like myself cannot accept. It seems as though I am only attracted to arrogant jerks. And I think I know why.

I respect a guy with confidence, sex appeal, and a hard edge. One with ambition and overwhelming amounts of passion. And more specifically, guys who are quite similar to me in spirit … but better.

But these challenging types always have similar flaws. And these flaws always seem to be the end-all in most of my relationships.

My high school sweetheart was exactly what I had hoped for in a guy, minus the flaws. He was perfect. And he knew it. He fell for me from our very first encounter, and won me over with his intense pursuit. He studied my every move, my every expression, and catered to my needs. Two years later, I moved off to college and we said our goodbyes. And as our last anticipated moment together came to an end, he said; "One day you will see that no guy will ever love you like I do." And five years later, I must admit that he was right…until now.

I call my new pursuer "The Gambler". His decisions in life are strictly based on chance. And in a way, his insatiable need for the thrill is quite invigorating to anyone around him. Myself included.

The only problem with the gambler is that he cannot stop when he is losing. He just keeps playing his cards until he beats the house. And I am beginning to feel as though I have become the house. We met by chance, and continued meeting for months. Somehow, we have established specific roles in our friendship that seem to resemble my relationship with my high school sweetheart. And somehow we maintain this liaison without sex, without commitment, and without my interest whatsoever. The Gambler took me to a Red Sox game last weekend and confessed his love. He then took me for dinner, drinks, and offered me tickets to next week's game.

He was and still is absolutely relentless. I used to always compare my boyfriends to my old sweetheart. No one was ever as perfect, until I met The Gambler. Most girls would dream of guys like this. Why don't I? What is it about caring, sweet, and loyal guys that turn me off recently? I wish I knew. Maybe it would be too easy. Maybe he is lacking something I want. Or maybe my taste in guys has simply turned sour.

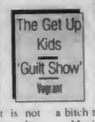
Get Up Kids feel the 'Guilt'

COURTESY VAGRANT RECORDS



Trading in the slower, distorted, acoustic backing that dominated their last release "On a Wire," the Get Up Kids' "Guilt Show" is packed with fast paced punk riffs.

By David Pessah
Collegian Staff

How many songs can you write about teenage-love gone awry? How many different ways can you reconstruct the details of how he/she broke your heart in song form before it becomes tedious and tired?

This is the conundrum the frontman of The Get Up Kids, Matthew Pryor, appears to be facing on their newest release, "Guilt Show."

It seems that Pryor has devoted more of his songwriting energy toward his lighter, more acoustic side project, the New Amsterdams. Earlier this year he released "Worse for the Wear" under the new moniker. While "Guilt Show" falters with abstract themes and wordplay, "Worse for the Wear" is filled with conceptual storylines and concise songs that convey direct meanings. It is not impossible to believe Pryor has just spread himself too thin, and there are no new ways to write about the same heartbreak over and over again.

This "Guilt Show" seems to be a showcase for others guilt more so than Pryor's. Song such as the fast-paced "Wouldn't Believe It" are rife with the bitterness that comes along with a lover's infidelity. As the chorus closes and Pryor screams, "well, I don't believe it too!" it echoes with the mournful sarcasm someone feels when they find out they've been duped by someone they have strong feelings toward. Throughout much of the album, Pryor portrays himself as the consistent victim with a good heart that continues to get broken by those he becomes close to. He goes so far as to yell "I'm a good soul, martyr me" on the excellent track of the same name.

Pryor does confess some inner feelings of his own guilt once — resulting in the heartfelt, very apologetic, but also bitter "Dark Night of the Soul." Over the tracks airy intro background that kicks into full-on riffs, the singer confesses his inner guilt about brooding over the breakup and the things we do to hurt the person that hurts us. Pryor confesses that he feels like "a monster with a mind of its own, a beast that poised to strike." We can feel his sorrowful confession as he sings "redemption is a bitch to end on."

Musically, besides a few experimental mishaps like the off kilter "Conversation," "Guilt Show" shines. Trading in the slower, distorted, acoustic backing that dominated their last release "On a Wire," "Show" is packed with fast paced punk riffs that show the continual growth of Jim Suptic and Robert Pope as excellent guitarists.

"Guilt Show" is a musical portrait of a band maturing. The lyrics may be too abstract and complex for the previous teenage fan base. That's what happens as you get older though, life becomes more complicated then when you're 17 and all that matters is that you and your girlfriend/boyfriend are having problems. It seems as we grow, there are more and more things in life that have potential to hurt. As "Is There a Way Out" winds down, and Pryor sings the final line "is there a safe route, Im all for it." We can't help but agree. It seems though, until Pryor finds that road, he'll have something to write about even if his fan base changes along with him.

Patriots' Belichick is no stranger to wheeling and dealing prior to NFL draft

FOXBORO, Mass. — Bill Belichick has never been afraid to trade his draft picks.

In the 2002 NFL draft, the New England coach moved up 11 spots to take tight end Daniel Graham from Colorado.

The Patriots went into last year's draft with 13 picks and made six trades, looking to 2004 rather than spend them all in a draft that was generally considered weak.

As the draft nears, Belichick is again willing to play the role of dealmaker. He told reporters yesterday that he would listen to any and all offers involving his team's nine selections in next weekend's draft.

"You pretty much talk to everybody," he said.

Belichick said the phones in his office have already been ringing steadily with inquiries from other teams interested in his two first-round picks — the 21st and 32nd overall.

The defending Super Bowl champions are the only team with two first-round selections.

"A lot of the teams that are ahead of us have talked to us about it," he said in a predraft news conference at Gillette Stadium.

"And we also have two picks in the second round as well, so a lot of teams have talked to us about moving back in exchange for multiple picks."

But Belichick isn't making any deals just yet.

"I think those are all going to be draft-day decisions," he said.

He dismissed published reports that had the Patriots swapping their two first-round picks, along with a second- and a fourth-rounder to Detriot for the Lions' No. 6 pick and a fourth-round selection.

Belichick said most draft-day trades are made with specific players in mind, and that it makes sense to pre-arrange the deal with potential suitors.

"You only have 15 minutes on the clock, so you don't want to be dialing around the league," he said. "It's a lot better to get that set up ahead of time. You just don't have time to carry on 31 conversations."

Belichick offered no specifics about the Patriots' intentions. He said there was solid depth in the draft for running backs and wide receivers, two of his team's needs.

The early rounds should also contain some offensive linemen and athletic outside linebackers worth considering, Belichick said.

With two Super Bowl titles in the past three years, there isn't a great sense of urgency to make a big splash with this draft.

"We can and have played with what we have," Belichick said. "We've got a chance to improve that, and we'll evaluate that and see what we can do. If we don't, then we've got guys who have won quite a few games for us."

Tiger in search of lost game

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

Tiger Woods is deep inside Fort Bragg this week, wearing a camouflage uniform and doing the kind of things Green Berets do. The cover story is that he flew down on his private jet to see what military life is all about.

The real truth is, Tiger's on a secret mission. Somewhere in the woods in North Carolina, he and the Special Forces are out trying to find his golf game.

As good as the Green Berets are, it won't be easy.

It doesn't help that Woods won't even admit it's missing.

Another in a string of disappointing majors ended early on Sunday for Woods, long before the cheers echoed from Amen Corner as Phil Mickelson and Ernie Els put on the kind of spectacular back-nine show that once belonged only to Woods.

If you're counting — and in golf that's usually a good way to keep score — Woods is now winless in seven straight majors. Worse yet, he hasn't even been a factor in the final round of five of them.

He's got a long way to go to rival Mickelson's oh-for-42 streak in the majors, but the tournaments are beginning to add up.

So, too, are the questions.

The player who once intimidated his fellow competitors simply by showing up on the first tee seems gone, replaced by a befuddled twin who goes about his work with an exasperated look on his face as putts race past the hole and drives go increasingly awry.

There are whispers about flaws in his swing, his conviction to golf, and his once all-consuming desire to win.

Things have gotten so bad that Woods vomited after the first hole Sunday, though he later claimed it was because of a bad sandwich, not a bad putt.

Through it all, Woods keeps repeating the same mantra to inquiring writers, as if he needs to believe it himself.

The numbers may say otherwise, but Woods insists he's not in a slump.

"It's different for me versus any other player," he said last week. "Some other player has a bad week, misses the cut, it's no big deal, slips through the radar.

Whereas if I shoot one bad round, it's a little bit different. I think it's just expectation levels."

Perhaps It Is. Golf fans were easily spoiled by Woods, who carries the burden of having to compete against his own past success.

Woods will likely never win four straight majors again, and may never match a record he once seemed destined to smash — Jack Nicklaus' 18 major championship wins.

He's got three green jackets from Augusta National, but the 10 that Nicklaus once predicted of him?

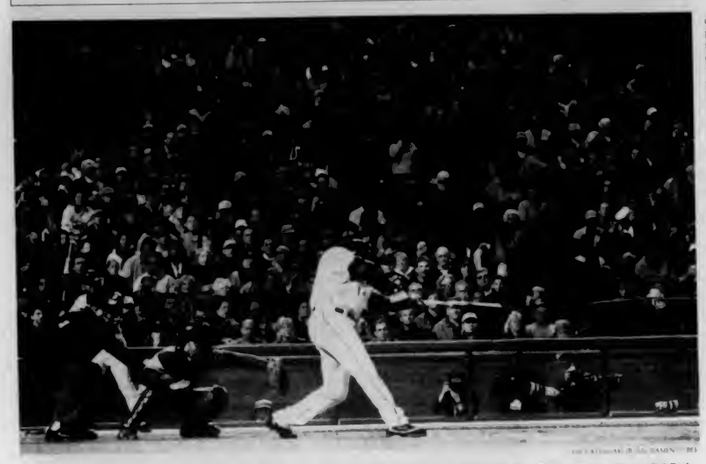
No way.

It's not because the other players are becoming more like Woods, but because he is becoming more like them. The gap has closed, but it took Woods coming back to the field to do it.

Woods is still the greatest player of his time, but all of a sudden it's not automatic that he'll be the best player ever as most assumed when he won seven of 11 major championships and 23 of 59 tournaments during a three-year stretch on the PGA Tour.

Woods remains in denial, insisting after almost every round that if a few putts just go his way he'll be just fine. Others wonder why he remains so stubborn about solving his own swing problems rather than reconciling with his former instructor Butch Harmon.

"Tiger is his own man. He knows what he wants to do," Harmon said earlier this year. "He knows that if he wanted my help, I'd always give it to him. He's smart enough to figure it out. He knows exactly what he's doing. He's just in a little bit of a down period."



Woods might be right, up to a point. When he was winning every tournament he entered, it seemed as if there wasn't a 10 footer he didn't make.

But now he also makes big numbers a routine part of every round, which was never the case a few years ago. At the Masters, he actually hit more greens and fairways than runner-up Els, yet finished 10 strokes behind him.

The difference was that Els made two eagles and no double bogeys, while Woods didn't have an eagle and made three doubles.

"It's not like I'm not trying out there," Woods said.

Woods might be encouraged to know that Nicklaus was in a strikingly similar slump about the same time in his career.

Barry Bonds follows through after hitting his 661st career homerun off of Milwaukee righthander Ben Ford Tuesday night at SBC Park.

Bonds won't look past 661

and set the single-season home run record with 73 in 2001, but he may never consider his career complete without a World Series ring. He fell six outs short of the title in 2002 and came back the next spring proclaiming his determination to give the Giants another chance to win it all.

He reiterated that sentiment Monday after splashing home run No. 660 into McCovey Cove to tie Mays. His solo shot Tuesday landed in nearly the same place — and was recovered by the same fan — in the water over the right-field fence.

"A championship. That's it," Bonds said. "I don't have any personal goals."

Someone asked Bonds if he believes he now has room to offer Mays a pointer or two.

Mays quickly piped in before Bonds could speak.

"That's kind of taboo, man," the Hall of Famer said.

"No," Bonds said emphatically, giving his answer with a quick glance at his godfather.

Yet only an inning before Bonds' Monday blast, he pulled catcher A.J. Pierzynski aside for a short pep talk.

"He told me not to worry that I'd been struggling, that there was a reason I was batting behind him," Pierzynski recalled. "It was an all-time moment."

During this special 29 1/2-hour span, many San Francisco fans forgot about the steroid scandal surrounding their star slugger and focused instead on his marvelous milestone.

Bonds' teammates have shown their support since the questions began to surface this offseason about whether Bonds got a boost from banned substances. He has repeatedly denied steroid use.

"Whenever someone or something is on top, somebody wants to bring it down for their own notoriety," Giants outfielder Dustan Mohr said. "You're not going to bring down baseball. It's the best game on earth. Guys should get more credit for the work they do in the offseason rather than someone accusing them of taking shortcuts. Fans only see us from 7 to 10 p.m."

Mays has refused to speak about the steroid controversy. He's more interested in getting Bonds to shed his prickly personality and become more fan friendly late in his career.

Mays didn't hit his 660th homer until he was in the twilight of his career at 42 and 3 months — on Aug. 17, 1973. Since he retired after that season, many players who were tagged with the title of being the next Willie Mays have fallen woefully short.

"I still think he's the greatest baseball player of all time, bottom line," Bonds said. "They were saying my dad was the next Willie Mays. They just got the name wrong, from Bobby to Barry."

Everybody's curious just how long it will be before Bonds decides he's done.

"I have a little bit of a timetable, and when I reach that timetable, that's it. It's over," said Bonds, who has expressed his plans to play out his contract, which runs through the 2006 season.

Bonds was asked if he'd thought about where he ranks among the best athletes ever, not just the baseball greats.

"Everyone's era is different," he said. "There are going to be great baseball players in every era. So, as long as you're proud of the achievements in your career, that's all that matters. If someone ever hits 73 home runs, I'll be there for them."

seven hits and three runs, walked one and struck out three in a losing effort.

The Huskies opened the flood gates early in the latter contest, as Hourigan began the onslaught with a bases loaded RBI single to right field that made the score 1-0. Tokarz and Maler then followed with back-to-back two-run singles before Donovan ripped a line drive to left to plate the Huskies sixth run and chase Hickey from the contest.

The Minutemen closed the gap in the fourth, as Szado drove in Athas and Curreri with a single through the right side that made it 6-2 in favor of UConn.

Connecticut did not let up, however, as the Huskies tacked on two more runs in the fifth and one in the sixth to push their lead to 9-2 before quelling UMass rallies in the sixth and seventh innings to seal the victory.

Game one was a scoreless affair until the fourth inning, when Stojanowski drove in Reynolds with a two-out single that gave UMass a 1-0 lead.

The Maroon and White capped its scoring in the fifth as Athas drove a one-out single up the middle to score freshman second baseman Anthony Santos and sophomore left-fielder Bill Rankin and increase UMass' lead to 3-0.

Boxer Gamache crying foul after devastating knockout

By Michael Virtanen
Associated Press

ALBANY, N.Y. – Four years after the knockout that ended his career, ex-champ Joey Gamache has a nephew boxing professionally, a new attorney and another lawsuit claiming fraud at his final weigh-in.

The 37-year-old also has neurological damage and headaches still from the brutal two-round KO by a larger man, said attorney Michael Coyle. Gamache has been doing some work as a boxing trainer and promoter but said the migraines stop him and he takes medications.

"I'm always optimistic in the sense that's the way I grew up," Gamache said Wednesday. "If I'm not feeling good or suffering, if I'm having problems, I keep things to myself."

The problems are public in federal court in Manhattan, where the latest lawsuit named boxer Arturo Gatti, his manager Patrick Lynch, promoters Top Rank and Main Events, former New York State Athletic Commission executive director Anthony Russo and ex-chairman Melville Southard Jr. The suit claims they all knew Gatti was overweight but made sure the fight went ahead.

"Joey's professional career as a fighter was ended by what, as far as I'm concerned, was a total fraud on the part of Gatti, his people, the promoters and the athletic commission," Coyle said.

Known for winning a $4.4 million jury award in 1996 for Kevin Rooney after the trainer was fired by heavyweight Mike Tyson, Coyle took over Gamache's case in December.

The defendants have denied any wrongdoing, saying Gatti reached the 141-pound contract limit and has been prone to gaining several pounds between weigh-ins and boxing matches the next day. The state inspector general's office agreed in a report last year.

The new suit seeking $10 million was filed on the four-year anniversary of the Feb. 26, 2000, HBO-televised fight. A $5.5 million suit against the commission filed two years ago is pending in the state Court of Claims.

The suits allege Russo let Gatti step off the scale even as the needle went all the way up, and then ignored complaints by Gamache's handlers. Less than 24 hours later, HBO unofficially weighed the boxers again, and Gatti came in at 160 pounds, while Gamache weighed 145.

"No human being puts on 10 pounds of muscle overnight. It's supposed to be a fair fight, and that's not a fair fight," said Coyle. He has the weigh-in videotape, he said.

Gatti, who now holds a world title at junior welterweight, has said his weight was questioned only because the fight was a blowout. "If I had beat him up for five or six rounds, then nobody would have said anything," he said.

Lynch has questioned the accuracy of the HBO's unofficial second weigh-in on fight night at Madison Square Garden, saying it was a bathroom scale on an uneven floor.

A spokesman for the athletic commission, which Russo left later in 2000, declined to comment on pending litigation.

The state attorney general's office is defending the commission in the Court of Claims and denied allegations of negligence and fraud, saying that Gamache knew the risks in boxing, and any injuries were caused by his own conduct or others for whom the commission is not responsible.

Gamache was knocked down twice in the first round and out in the second.

The Manhattan district attorney's office looked into allegations of athletic commission (NYSAC) wrongdoing and turned findings over to the state inspector general's office (OSIG), which issued its report last year.

The inspector general found "no reason ... to conclude that whatever events occurred at the weigh-in or thereafter were the result of any NYSAC official's improper conduct. NYSAC told OSIG that there has been no lawsuit filed or action requested by anyone involved in that bout."

Gamache's former attorney announced publicly weeks after the fight they were making a claim against the commission and would sue.

The inspector general also noted that Gamache's handlers had rejected an advance offer for a same-day weigh-in.

Same day weigh-ins are considered riskier because of boxer dehydration, Coyle said. Gamache himself was struggling to get under 141 pounds. The ex-boxer said that's really the issue.

"Who couldn't have admiration for a guy like Joe Gatti who fights his heart out. He's a warrior," Gamache said. "But if I had to make weight, he should have had to make weight."

April showers...

The Massachusetts softball team's home contest with Connecticut was postponed yesterday for a second consecutive afternoon due to poor field conditions at the UMass Softball Complex. The Minutewomen hope to return to action this afternoon, as they are scheduled to host Boston College at 4 p.m.

Minutemen split at UConn

Barnett hurls shutout as UMass climbs back to .500

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

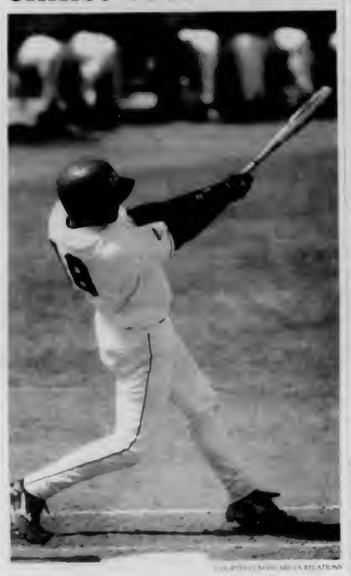
With Tuesday's home contest with Connecticut postponed due to poor conditions at Earl Lorden Field, the Massachusetts baseball team was forced to make up the contest as part of a doubleheader yesterday in Storrs, Conn., and the results were as mixed as the Amherst weather.

With head coach Mike Stone saving his top starters for the weekend, sophomore righthander Jason Hickey struggled mightily as the Minutemen (10-10 2-4 Atlantic 10) dropped the second game 9-2, while freshman righthander Devin Barnett tossed a complete game shutout to pace UMass to a 3-0 win in game one.

Shortstop Mike Athas had a team-high three hits on the afternoon.

The Maroon and White return to action this weekend, when it will travel to Norristown, Penn. for an Atlantic 10 series with St. Joseph's.

Senior tri-captain Mike Athas and sophomore catcher Frank Curreri paced the UMass offense with three hits on the afternoon, while senior tri-captain Matt Reynolds, classmate Adam Stojanowski and junior outfielder Curt Szado all chipped in with a pair of hits.



On the mound, Hickey was roughed up for five hits and six runs in two-thirds of an inning in the second game, and was pulled in favor of junior righthander Anthony Gallo after facing just nine hitters.

Barnett, meanwhile, allowed six hits to just four different batters while striking out one and walking one in seven scoreless innings to post the first complete game shutout of his young career. He is now 2-0 on the season with an earned run average of 3.57.

The Huskies (17-13 5-5 Big East) were lead offensively by junior first baseman Jeff Hourigan's four hits and two runs batted in in the two games, while senior infielder Dave Tokarz, sophomore outfielder Bryan Maier and freshman infielder Dennis Donovan all collected a pair of RBI in the second contest.

Starting pitcher Rich Sirois lasted five innings, giving up four hits and two runs while walking one and striking out none to earn the win in game two. In the first game, Josh MacDonald allowed

Third baseman Adam Stojanowski drove in the eventual game-winning run in the first game with a two-out single in the fourth.

CU's Barnett acknowledges misbehavior

By Jon Sarche
Associated Press

BROOMFIELD, Colo. — Suspended University of Colorado football coach Gary Barnett acknowledges there was misbehavior at a 2001 party at the center of a rape scandal. He also says everyone at the off-campus gathering is to blame.

Barnett, questioned for nearly five hours Tuesday by a panel investigating recruiting practices at Colorado, said there were 10 people at the party, including four football players. The four later lost their scholarships and were charged with contributing to the delinquency of a minor for providing alcohol.

"There is no question in my mind that inappropriate behavior occurred," Barnett said. "There is no question that the behavior of the 10 young people involved was the result of their own poor decisions and under the influence of alcohol."

Two women have alleged they were raped at the party by players or recruits; a third said she was assaulted in a dorm room shortly afterward. They are suing in federal court, seeking unspecified damages for what they say was the school's failure to rein in athletes and provide equal protection to women.

At least eight women since 1997 have accused Colorado football athletes of rape though no charges have been filed. Separate probes are under way by the state attorney general and university.

Barnett's testimony was the most dramatic yet before the Board of Regents' panel investigating whether Colorado uses sex and alcohol to entice recruits. The panel voted to ask for more time to complete its work, meaning a report wouldn't come out until the end of May.

Dressed in a suit and tie and occasionally raising his voice, Barnett said he feels responsible for his players' performance on the field as well as their behavior in the community. But he said there is only so much he can do.

"I have 48 that I have held accountable over the last five years. I can't live their lives for them," he said.

Barnett was put on paid leave for comments he made about two of the alleged rape cases, including that of Katie Hnida, a former kicker who said she was raped by a teammate in 2000. He called her an "awful" player as he answered questions about why she left Colorado to later enroll at the University of New Mexico.

Barnett waded into the controversy again Tuesday, telling the panel he spoke with Hnida's friends, former teammates and a rape counselor who spent time with the young woman, and that none heard her talk about harassment or assault.

"I couldn't find anybody to substantiate one single claim and I was looking to substantiate it," Barnett said.

He repeated his belief that Hnida wasn't a good player, but said he wanted her on the team to give her a chance of fulfilling her dream of playing college football.

"I didn't care how awful she was, I wanted her on the team," Barnett said. He said he hoped her presence would help his players learn more about women, and prompt them to behave.

A few hours before Barnett spoke, the panel released a March 30 e-mail from Dr. David Hnida, the woman's father and an Army surgeon now in Iraq. Hnida said Barnett and other university officials must have known about sexual harassment problems his daughter was having at Colorado before she left.

"We both have been distressed at the information we read coming from the university, as well as Gary Barnett," he wrote. "To be blunt, there is quite a bit of lying and deception right now."

Hnida said his daughter would be willing to speak to the panel.

Since the controversy erupted, the school has made sweeping changes to its recruiting program. The NCAA is looking at recruiting reforms.

Canadiens looking to regroup after collapse in Game 4

MONTREAL (AP) — The Montreal Canadiens planned a little group therapy and a team dinner yesterday to recover from their 4-3 double-overtime loss to the Boston Bruins.

The defeat, in which the Canadiens blew a 3-1 lead, left them down three games to one in the best-of-seven Eastern Conference quarterfinal series and facing elimination in Game 5 Thursday night in Boston.

Defenseman Sheldon Souray and coach Claude Julien backed off criticism of star forward Alex Kovalev for abandoning the puck after he was slashed on the hand at 9:27 of the second overtime, leaving Boston's Glen Murray free to score the game-winner on a breakaway.

"It's a long year and sometimes you're going to have distractions," captain Saku Koivu said yesterday. "You have the clear the table and then forget the whole thing. That's what we're going to do. I don't think there will be a problem, but if there is, we'll talk about it."

Kovalev was flapping his hand in pain after being hit on the glove by Travis Green and collided with Souray, who was chasing back to get the puck. Murray did the rest, sending the Bruins home to Boston with a chance to win the series rather than tied two games apiece.

After the game, Souray said that even if a player is hurt, he shouldn't "quit on the play." Yesterday, his tone was softer.

"I wasn't blaming anyone. I was just disappointed in the way we lost," said Souray. "Alex was probably our best player in the game. It was just an unfortunate play that ended up costing us the game. But whatever happened, it's in the past."

Julien also backed off from his post-game comments.

"I don't think I said 'he,' I said 'we' can't stop playing until the ref blows the whistle," Julien said. "But as far as that's concerned, we said what we had to say. Right now, we want to focus on the game."

Kovalev's response was that "If they made those comments, that's what they think. I can't control that."

Kovalev scored two goals in Montreal's 3-2 win in Game 3 on Sunday and added another in Game 4 before the overtime incident.

"A lot of the guys came to me and said it's not my fault, which was great to see," he said. "But sometimes, you can't let it go. You still feel responsible for the loss. With the way we played, we should have won that game."

The Canadiens were less than a minute from winning in regulation when Mike Knuble put a backhander past Jose Theodore's left pad from the edge of the crease. The referees on the ice disallowed the goal, but the call was reversed after video replays showed the puck crossed the goal line.

"It would have been a lot different attitude around here today then if we lost," Knuble said on the Bruins' Web site. "To come back to the FleetCenter and have a chance to close out the series is great. The nucleus of this group hasn't been out of the first round in two tries, so we're looking forward to doing it."

The Bruins, who did not practice on the ice on Wednesday, were expecting a spirited game from the Canadiens on Thursday.

"We have to give them respect," Martin Lapointe said. "They've been playing pretty well so far, so we can't take anything for granted."

For Montreal, Thursday's task is simple: win or go home.

"We're in a tough situation, but if we win the next game and then come back here (for Game 6 on Saturday), you never know what will happen," said Kovalev, adding he expects to play Thursday. "I've never lost in the first round and I want to keep that record."

Notes: Canadiens defenseman Stephane Quintal, who left in the second period after jamming his right wrist or arm in a fall against the boards, had his arm in a sling. Julien said Quintal's chances of returning in the series were "very slim." That would put rookie defenseman Mike Komisarek into his first career playoff game...Julien said he will not pull Theodore for backup Mathieu Garon. "There's no question of changing the goalie," Julien said. "We know he can do as well as (Boston goalie) Andrew Raycroft. This would be a good time for him to show it."

Bonds contemplates whats comes next

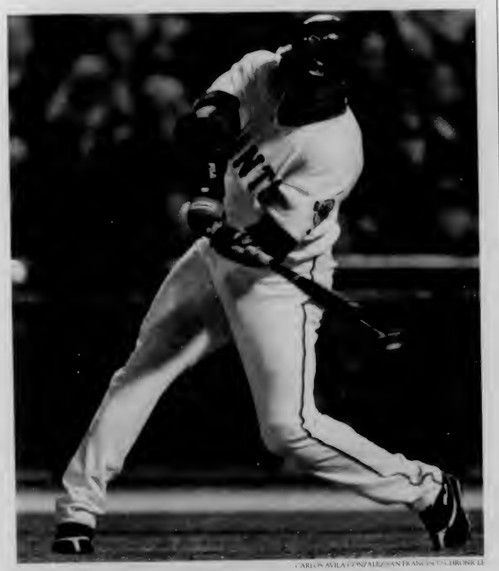
By Janie McCauley
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — So, what's next for Barry Bonds? He doesn't even want to think about it. Not yet, anyway.

Bonds was so busy passing his godfather in his climb up the home run list, he didn't ponder what might happen once he accomplished the feat.

With his seemingly effortless swing and powerful 39-year-old body still going strong, anything appears possible for the San Francisco slugger.

"I'm not going to try to figure out what's next," said Bonds, who homered on consecutive days to reach No. 661 and pass Willie Mays for third place. "I'm just trying to stay healthy and win a championship."



Babe Ruth (714) and Hank Aaron (755) still loom in Bonds' path, of course. But first, Bonds wants to enjoy his latest historic homer.

After all of his accomplishments, he believes he's finally earned the admiration of his godfather.

"Barry doesn't need approval from me, because I've been there since he was 5," said Mays, a teammate of Bonds' late father, Bobby. "Whatever he does, right or wrong, I'm going to be there for him .... Barry knows how much I love him."

Hunger strike ends with rally

Graduate Employee Organization protests international student fee

By Dan O'Brien
Collegian Staff

A group of international students held a rally to protest the University of Massachusetts' new international student fee, halting the majority of pedestrian traffic into Whitmore Administration Building yesterday.

The rally was part of an end to the Graduate Employee Organization's 48-hour hunger strike against the $65 fee.

The majority of the comments from speakers gave the same message: most of the protestors claim their opposition to the fee is not about the cost, but the principle of placing a fee on certain students and not others, solely due to their nationality.

Anil Duman, a member of GEO, said that if one particular group is singled out, then she fears that in the future, other groups may be singled out on campus as well.

"Now its affecting one group, but who's to say that it won't affect women, and other minorities later on? We think this is a discriminatory act that could affect all other groups on campus later," Duman said.

Another GEO member, Alejandro Reuss, also said that the reason students are protesting is not just about their own self interests.

"[It is] much easier to let someone else camp out in the rain, disrupt their lives, and organize a protest," Reuss said.

The crowd showed contempt toward the last speaker of the rally, Christina Sosa, who works for the Registrar for the Education Abroad program. Sosa took the microphone trying to disprove comments made by a particular speaker. Her comments sparked negative reaction from the crowd, who yelled comments at her as she spoke.

"This fee has nothing to do with surveillance," Sosa said. "I've worked in this office since 1986 and we've always kept files on international students."

After making this comment her microphone was abruptly pulled away. The protestor who pulled the microphone then spoke, calling for his fellow protestors to march to Chancellor John V. Lombardi's office inside Whitmore.

The protestors began yelling, "We won't pay!" as the crowd of approximately 250 marched into the building.

The crowd made their way outside Lombardi's office, but he was reportedly not in the building. After a few minutes, the crowd marched to Provost Christina Seymour's office. Seymour was also reportedly unavailable.

Many protestors said their main concern with the fee is that it will be used to cover costs to pay for surveillance of international students. That surveillance is part of the fee that covers compliance with the Student Exchange Visitor Information System, a requirement of the Patriot Act put in place following the events of Sept. 11.

While 8 percent of the fee will be used to fund a one-person position whose job is to coordinate international students' visa information into the federal government's

Speaker: New slavery a US issue

By Danielle Henry
Collegian Correspondent

The Central Intelligence Agency estimates that 20,000 people are enslaved in the United States, Tommy Lee Calvert said yesterday in a speech in Herter Hall.

"Slavery will be one of the formational issues of our generation," the chief of external operations of the American Anti-Slavery Group said. "It has been students who have been the backbone of the contemporary abolitionists movement."

Calvert said that slavery is the third largest crime in the world, behind drugs and arms. There are as many people enslaved in the world as there are people living in Canada or Peru, but "people are denying that this happens."

There have been only six slavery cases in the United States in the past five years, Calvert explained this by stating that the nature of the trade is highly secretive, making the victims hard to find.

The first slavery case in the U.S. was in New Hampshire in 2003. Bradley Tree Services recruited two men in Jamaica and brought them back to work for their small company, Calvert said.

The two men, according to Calvert, were made to live in a shack through the winter, attacked with dogs, and threatened with the murder of their families in Jamaica. A neighbor reported it and brought it to the attention of the American Anti-Slavery Group.

The majority of slaves in the U.S. are forced into domestic servitude. However, the prevalence of child slavery, sex slavery and debt bondage is apparent throughout the world.

Calvert said that poor families couldn't pay off their debt due to interest up to 60 percent. There are even times when a child might be sold into debt bondage for a motorcycle, a television or for cigarettes, he said.

"The culture of acceptance and demand is driving slavery," Calvert said. Particularly, he said, if he was a teacher he wouldn't give an A to anyone who didn't mention demand as the main problem with continuing sex slavery. Most of the students attending

Recycling program offers cash rewards

By Amanda Koeck
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts recently started a new program aimed at increasing recycling on campus and offering students and employees rewards for their effort to participate.

The new program, called Cash for Trash, offers students and employees of UMass $1, deposited into their UCard account for each used, undamaged cell phone and laser or ink toner cartridge they recycle.

The money earned from the recycled materials will be deposited on a monthly basis.

More than 130 people have registered for the program, which was launched on Mar. 23. The Office of Waste Management and The UCard Office have teamed up with C3 Recycling Systems for the new program.

"Since it is very, very early in the program, only a couple of items have been received," said Lorenzo Macaluso, projects coordinator for the Office of Waste Management at UMass.

"We know everyone won't do it, but entrepreneurial students will probably go around and collect items from other students and parents or friends," said Tom Mahaney, operations manager at the UCard office.

Students may have friends or parents or relatives working for big companies that have a lot of recyclables to donate, according to Mahaney.

"There are too many things being thrown out," he said.

On the Web site for the program, members can print out mailing labels and mail their old cell phones and empty printer cartridges to C3 Recycling Systems.

Some of the items will be mailed as far as California, according to Mahaney. Those interested in mailing large quantities of recyclables will find free shipping materials on the Web site.

C3 Recycling Systems will refill and sell the recycled cartridges.

Epson brand inkjets are not redeemable for money because they cannot be refilled, though they are still recyclable, Mahaney said.

Because of the recycling program already in place through the Office of Waste Management, participants cannot receive money for recycling printer cartridges purchased by UMass.

"Something like this, we hope, will get students thinking about recycling," said Macaluso. According to Macaluso, more people will use their UCards and Cash For Trash helps OWM get more recycling done on campus.

"There is no downside to it," he said.

Programs like Cash For Trash are usually fundraisers for non-profit organizations.

Some elementary schools have bought new computers and software with monies raised from recycling programs. Two elementary schools in West Springfield participated in similar programs for three years, according to Plotoday.com.

People interested in Cash For Trash can register at www.umass.edu/ucard/Cashfortrash.html.

Europe rejects bin Laden truce

An undated image of al-Qaida leader Osama bin Laden is shown on screen as Arab satellite network al-Arabiya broadcasts a new audio recording of a man identifying himself as bin Laden yesterday.

No negotiation policy upheld by leaders

By Jill Lawless
Associated Press

LONDON (AP) — Key European nations, including Iraq war opponents Germany and France, vigorously rejected a truce offer purportedly from Osama bin Laden yesterday, saying there could be no negotiating with his al-Qaida terrorist network.

Many saw the audiotaped offer as an attempt to drive a wedge between the United States and its European allies, and one analyst said it might contain a message to militants to hold back on attacks against Europe.

The tape, which the CIA said is likely to an authentic recording of bin Laden, was broadcast on Arab TV stations offering "a truce ... to any country which does not carry out an onslaught against Muslims or interfere in their affairs."

In Italy, a nation shocked by the killing of an Italian civilian captured by militants in Iraq, Foreign Minister Franco Frattini said it was "unthinkable that we may open a negotiation with bin Laden, everybody understands this."

French President Jacques Chirac, one of the firmest opponents of the Iraq war, was equally blunt: "No dealings are possible with terrorists."

Secretary of State Colin Powell told Polish television that "this is a time for all of us to be ever more resolute and say to Osama bin Laden, 'No, we will not listen to any of these demands. You are the one who is wrong. You are the one who must be brought to justice'."

Pollution affecting 31 states

By John Heilprin
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Counties in 31 states are flunking air-quality standards, drawing a federal warning to clean up industrial plants, put new restrictions on cars and take other action to make their air less polluted.

Nearly 500 counties, mostly in California and the eastern third of the country, were cited Thursday as having too much smog-causing pollution in violation of the federal clean air law.

The Environmental Protection Agency told state and local officials to develop new pollution controls to reduce ground-level ozone, a precursor of smog. Some 159 million people, about half the U.S. population, live in areas singled out by the government for contributing to unhealthy air.

Acting under court order, the EPA identified all or parts of 474 counties that either have air that is too dirty or have pollution that causes neighboring counties to fail the air quality test.

Despite having some of the toughest air pollution requirements, California still has the worst air, the EPA said.

The Los Angeles basin was designated as having severe air pollution, the only one in the category. The area has until 2021 to come into compliance with the federal standard.

Speaker refers to slavery as a 'formational issue' for students the lecture were from Legal Studies 397 Z, "Slavery and the Law," taught by Assistant Professor Bernie D. Jones.

Touching on the problems with Iraq, Calvert said that there are ships associated with Osama bin Laden that transport arms and people for the purposes of slavery. He also said it is in the interest of national security to stop bin Laden from getting revenues from human transporting.

It is difficult to pinpoint particular products that support the slave trade, Calvert said. One example is the Teachers Insurance and Annuity Association - College Retirement Equities Fund that was invested in a Canadian company involved in the enslavement and genocide of people in Sudan, until the issue was brought to a head.

The Torture Victim Protection Act, passed in 1991, Calvert said, is more about education than it is about enforcement. It grants a "cause of action" for two international law violations: torture and extra judicial killing. He added that the audience needed to educate the community.

The founders of the American Anti-Slavery Group are from Sudan and Mauritania, Africa. Predominantly Muslim, Sudan is in the midst of a jihad, or holy war. In the Koran it is said that during a jihad enemies may be enslaved. Calvert said that in order to stop slavery in Sudan, there must be peace.

stations Al-Jazeera and Al-Arabiya — is the first attributed to bin Laden since January.

"I am offering a truce to European countries," the speaker on the tape said. "Its core is our commitment to cease operations against any country which does not carry out an onslaught against Muslims or interfere in their affairs."

The message said "the door to a truce is open for three months" but the time frame could be extended. "The truce will begin when the last soldier leaves our countries," the speaker said without elaborating.

The CIA said the tape was likely an authentic recording of bin Laden, who is believed to be hiding in the mountains along the Pakistan-Afghanistan border.

Charles Heyman, an analyst at Jane's Defense Weekly, said the tape was "a not very subtle attempt to break whatever coalition there is and to destabilize the situation in Iraq."

Several European governments strongly opposed to the Iraq war quickly rejected the offer. Chirac, speaking in Algeria, said terrorism "is a barbarous act that attacks innocent people."

"One cannot lean on religion or any other motivation to perpetrate terrorist acts," said Chirac, whose country has troops in Afghanistan but not in Iraq. "No discussion with terrorism."

EPA warns of wide-scale air pollution

Three California regions — Riverside County, San Joaquin Valley, Sacramento — were listed with serious pollution, the fourth-worst designation, and given until 2013 to curtail the pollution.

Other areas with marginal or moderate pollution problems have until either 2007 to 2010 to comply. Areas that continue to violate the standard could lose federal highway dollars.

Those areas include a ring of Great Lakes states and a concentration of Northeast states from the Washington, D.C., area to Boston. Also failing the federal test were parts of eastern Tennessee, Georgia, North Carolina, and Dallas, Houston and San Antonio.

The EPA said regions in noncompliance may have to impose new controls on industrial plants, restrict transportation and require tougher vehicle inspection programs. Some counties may have to require the use of special, cleaner-burning gasoline.

"Many communities will find it difficult to eventually meet such standards without jeopardizing local economic growth," said Jeffrey Marks of the National Association of Manufacturers. He said more than half of the country's manufacturing capacity is in areas that do not meet the air standards.

SEVIS database, the other $60 will be put toward specific services for international students provided by the International Programs Office, Director Frank Hugus told The Massachusetts Daily Collegian in March.

The rally brought out not only members of the UMass community, but also members from the town of Amherst as well. Gerry Weiss, who works for the public activist group Not In Our Town and happens to be on the Town of Amherst Select Board, spoke out against the fees.

"Since Sept. 11, this country has been on a path of nationalism and xenophobia. And the town of Amherst and the country loses as a result," Weiss said.

At one point Weiss told the crowd to read the protestor's signs to understand his message.

Two of the signs read, "SEVIS is not a service," and "Protection not Persecution."

Craig Sinclair, an international GEO student summed up the event when he said, "We're not going to pay for it and we'll continue to not pay for it until the University comes up with a way to pay for the service ... And that's to pay for it themselves."

Kerry must define himself in new ads

Presidential candidate John Kerry has announced that he will launch his new advertising campaign sometime next week. The goal of the ad campaign, according to Kerry, is to inform those who do not know much about him, "A lot of people don't really know who I am," Kerry said. "The level of communication we need to establish is enormous."

Kerry still trails president George W. Bush by millions of dollars in terms of funds raised on the campaign trail. However, the Massachusetts senator has not allowed this fact to define him or his standing in the race. Even still, it is crucial that Kerry outline, as clearly as possible, who he is and what he stands for.

The differential in funds is not the only obstacle that Kerry must overcome in the coming weeks and months. His "support" of the war in Iraq is still confusing to some people, and considered misleading to others. Kerry voted in 2002 to support President Bush's use of force in Iraq. Therefore, he has been required to balance his support for the operation with his opposition of the way it has been carried out by the Bush administration. This has left people wondering just where Kerry stands on this issue, which is an issue that will undoubtedly go a long way in determining the November election.

Another contradictory topic that Kerry must straighten out in his ad campaign is that of gay marriage. Kerry is looking to become the second Roman Catholic president ever, following fellow Bay-Stater John F. Kennedy. He has made clear that he is pro-choice, which contradicts the views of the Roman Catholic Church. Kerry has already started to alleviate this problem by meeting with Cardinal Theodore McCarrick, the archbishop of Washington, D.C, on Thursday. While neither party commented after the meeting, it is clear that Kerry is taking strides toward forming more of an identity for himself.

President Bush released a controversial ad campaign last month that featured emotional images of the Sept. 11 attacks and their aftermath. Some people praised the ads for their sincerity, while others criticized them for dodging the issues and inappropriately tugging on the heartstrings of Americans. Kerry must avoid such tactics in his new campaign. He must be more concise in his message, and truly get at the issues that the American people are wavering on. Patriotic rhetoric volced over classical music may be acceptable for Bush, the incumbent, since voters have had time to evaluate and criticize him for almost four years. But Kerry, who is new to such a large-scale, national spotlight, does not have this luxury. He must make it clear who he is, and why people should vote for him.

If Kerry is to be successful, he must form more of an identity. He must become someone that the American public can rally around. It is impossible for this to be done with so many questions and uncertainties remaining.

How can he be a Catholic who is also pro-choice? How can a democrat so opposed to Bush support the operation in Iraq? If Kerry can use his new ad campaign to take a firmer stand on issues, and clear up any misconceptions that the American public might have about his character, it would go a long way in assisting his campaign.

Why I hate Dan

Sanam Hakim

I just wanted to write this article to say that I really hate Dan Verdolino. He is the most horrible person I have ever met in my entire life and his best quality is his hemp necklace. He watches baseball every now and then and sometimes he plays computer games, which is not what I would be doing in my spare time, so I write that off as an instant character flaw. He takes a lot of engineering classes, which really sucks because I don't really like engineering. Also, we were talking about abortion once and he told me that he is pro-choice and I got really mad because I am pro-life. I really hope that everyone remembers his name and hates him, because he just really isn't a good person at all.

Actually, Dan is my buddy and he's a great person. The reason I insulted him in my opening paragraph was to demonstrate what always happens with newspapers ... especially when politics are involved.

Think about the concept of a newspaper: on the front page you read about what is happening around you and, on the pages that follow, you read columns and letters to the editor containing different opinions about front page news. It's interesting to read all the different opinions. It allows you to see things from several different eyes and absorb the views of the people around you, no matter how different they are.

But what happens when these opinionated articles are used to attack individual people on campus?

This idea has made itself especially prevalent on campus during the recent Student Government Association presidential election controversies. The newspaper has been filled with political columns, back and forth fighting, making fun of real people on campus. We have read columns defending the SGA, and some attacking the SGA. We have read columns defending Bustamante and Murphy and attacking Higgins and Daly, and we have read columns defending Higgins and Daly and attacking Bustamante and Murphy. We have read columns that have directly named and attacked the administration. We have read columns that have directly named and attacked individuals on campus.

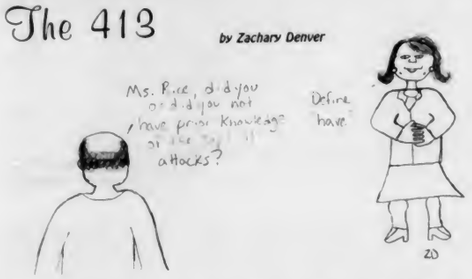
The opening paragraph to my column is similar to the types of columns that are being written regarding the elections, and it is ridiculous. It's become like a child's game of exchanging the words "Nuh uh" and "Yuh huh" or fighting with daddy about whose fault it is. Essentially, this game is pulling people in different directions. In my opinion, it's pulling people in the wrong direction, telling them to move away from one candidate and toward another, not by qualification, but by default. If you ask students on campus to say what they know about the candidates, most will spit back negative qualities. This is harming the campus.

Think about it logically — if Bob and Joe are playing a video game together, there are two main ways Bob can win, aside from cheating. Bob could either spend the whole time trying to make Joe lose points, or Bob can spend the whole time trying to gain points. In other words, Bob could either try to win or try to make Joe lose. If Bob chooses to try to make Joe lose instead of trying to win, Bob will stay at zero for the whole game, trying to keep Joe down too. Logically, if Joe and Bob just tried to get the most points, you have two people with lots of points trying to get the most points, instead of Joe and Bob, stuck at zero.

For the last month, these columns and letters to the editor have appeared in almost every issue of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. These pieces of writing are not only attacking real people on campus, but they are filling our minds with cruel statements that

Instead of focusing on the important issue of 'who will offer more to this University as SGA president?' our focus is being turned to 'who has the least negative qualities?'

change the way we look at things. Instead of focusing on the important issue of "who will offer more to this University as SGA president?" our focus is being turned to "who has the least negative qualities?" which we have collected through these columns.



I guess that's the way the game works.

Don't be consumed by broadcasts of negative qualities. It is only through positives that we can advance. And when you go down to vote in the elections again, remember that, without the focus on positive qualities, we will stay at zero forever, and zeros will always win the game.

The messy truth about UMass

Leah Wyner

I have a bone to pick with the University of Massachusetts student body.

The aspect of college that shocked me the most by far was the mess. I'm not talking about the messy rooms: I'm talking about the mess that's everywhere else. The way students treat this campus has been bothering me all year and it's been getting progressively worse.

What started out as thousands of kids out on their own, wreaking havoc and having a good time, has become simple and unabashed disrespect for this campus, and the maintenance staff who work hard to keep it clean. They have a job to do, and it's not running around picking up the trash you're too lazy to walk 10 yards to dispose of.

If you don't feel like cleaning your room, by all means, don't. No one's perfect; I would be lying if I said I didn't have at least 19 articles of clothing on the floor of my room right now. But everywhere else on campus is a different story, and the student body of this university needs to shape up.

First of all, the bathroom is not your own personal trashcan. I know we're all dead in the morning, but sheer fatigue is not an excuse to throw massive amounts of toilet paper on the ground. Because the sinks do not have their own garbage disposals, if you leave something, it will stay there. So don't. Also, hair does not belong on the walls of the showers. Either clean up your act, or reassess your shampooing technique. And girls, don't throw your tampons, pads and wrappers on the ground. Those napkin disposals are there for a reason. No one deserves to pick up your used sanitary supplies. Seriously.

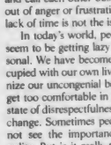
Describing all the junk in the elevators could fill a separate column altogether. Some of the stuff is expected but it's not OK to drop beer cans in the elevators, but we're college kids, and this is a party school. It's bound to happen sometimes. However, it's not OK to make everyone else wade through cans and sticky beer residue because you're too drunk, stupid or lazy to walk to the trash room.

Some of the stuff people drop in the elevator is just beyond any kind of reasoning I can think of. I once walked in to find salami, ham and bologna on the ground. In all honesty, who does that? A bitter vegetarian? What kinds of people get their kicks by ordering a sandwich for lunch and then dropping the contents on the elevator floor? And why do people leave overturned ice cream cones on the floor? Why? It's disgusting, it melts, and it's a waste of perfectly good ice cream. Whoever you are, you'd better hope that I never catch you in the act.

Then of course there are the grounds. I actually decided to write this column the day I counted 23 orange muffins smashed into the rainy asphalt between Hampshire Dining Commons and Kennedy Hall. Who does that? Even the flightiest people must realize that if you smush a muffin, you walk around with muffin on your shoes for a good hour. They may not be Grandma's special muffins, but someone went to the trouble to order them. Someone brought them inside, refrigerated them, and then arranged them on a tray so that you, the future of this country, could take them outside and stomp on them. It's just not right.

I won't go into much more detail about the outside of this campus because you see it every day. But know that every gum wrapper does damage. Every tissue, napkin, and soda can, apple core and coffee cup, and every little flier advertising some frat party makes a difference.

What started out as thousands of kids out on their own, wreaking havoc and having a good time, has become simple and unbashed disrespect for this campus, and the maintenance staff who work hard to keep it clean.



I just don't get it. The first thing I remember learning in life was that my brother was not a medium on which I could practice my haircutting skills. But as I swept up the hair I had lopped off, I learned something much more valuable: how to clean up after myself. I also have very clear memories of learning that I had to make my bed, rinse the toothpaste out of the sink after I brushed, and that if I chose to play Picasso on the bathroom mirror with my mom's best Lancôme lipstick, I had to clean it up.

I'm sure we all had those enlightening experiences at some point. So what happened? Where along the line did we become muffin-stomping connoisseurs? For The Daily Riot-Gram, the April Fool's day edition of this newspaper, one of the "joke" articles mentioned replacing the entire maintenance staff with misbehaving students as a disciplinary method. It was a joke, but the concept of students picking up trash isn't all that crazy. Maybe you wouldn't throw lunchmeat on the ground if you knew it could be one of your friends picking it up. Regardless, something needs to change — and fast.

But until then, pick up after yourself. Fight that urge to smash muffins. If you're out partying like a rock star, the least you can do is throw away your empties. And never, under any circumstances, leave overturned ice cream cones in the elevator, or anywhere else. Think of the people that have to clean it up. Think of that poor guy who steps in it on the way to the math test he's already dreading. Think of what your mother would say if she saw you do it. And if nothing else, you might worry about a certain feisty columnist catching you in your ice-cream-flipping, muffin-smashing, toilet-paper-throwing, salami-dropping ways.

A little kindness goes a long way

Becky Martins

Call me old-fashioned, but when does a "thanks" or "gesundheit" ever go unappreciated? In my book: never.

Common courtesy is becoming an archaic practice in today's society. Granted, our lives are going at a more hectic pace than ever before. But is this reason enough to forget the manners we should have learned as children? People manage to cut others off in traffic, shut doors in other people's faces, and call each other obscene things out of anger or frustration. Thus, a lack of time is not the issue.

In today's world, people simply seem to be getting lazy and impersonal. We have become too preoccupied with our own lives to recognize our uncongenial behavior. We get too comfortable in our current state of disrespectfulness to make a change. Sometimes people just do not see the importance in being polite. But is it really that hard to be courteous? Surely, making an effort never hurt anyone.

It is probably more a fault than a positive attribute of my personality, but I assume others are like me. As a child, I was raised to have good manners. I never thought of disrespecting teachers, peers or my parents. I always believed the rest of the world took the same approach to life. But now seeing society from an adult's point of view, I realize how overly optimistic this thinking was. I guess I live by the saying "do as you would want done to yourself." Now, I just know not to expect much in return. People's lack of courtesy is evident in all aspects of life. At the University of Massachusetts we experience it all the time. Drivers fly through crosswalks, though students wait to walk. Students scan their UCards to enter dorms, yet fail to hold doors open for others coming in behind them. People cause large disruptions in halls, regardless of their peer's rooms being within hearing distance. Everyday, we encounter an individual oblivious to the feelings of those around him or her. But sometimes, impoliteness becomes even more personal.

Every college student can attest to the fact that roommates are capable of discourteous behavior. Sometimes, it is unintentional: two people living with each other are bound to have gripes over petty things. But sometimes the problems are more serious. We have all heard stories of "roommates from hell." There is the ever-popular tale of one roommate having to deal awkwardly with the other's intimate situation. We also know of people whose space was invaded upon and belongings of the other person were used. We have even heard of roommates stealing or completely destroying another person's property simply due to ill feelings.

In today's world, people simply seem to be getting lazy and impersonal. We have become too preoccupied with our own lives to recognize our uncongenial behavior.

These may be drastic cases of impoliteness, but they still show people's lack of concern for others. Today's youth seems to already be following down the same disrespectful path. As a part-time job I work at an after-school program for a local elementary school. Not having any siblings considerably younger than myself, I came into the job with little knowledge of children today. I hoped most would behave and respect others as I had at that age. But soon enough, I was proved wrong. It is now a common occurrence for the children to disrespect the staff and their peers. Students pushing their limits are constantly undermining our authority. Too often, I return home exhausted, bewildered by the lack of respect younger generations possess for others. It is a scary thought that many young people fail to possess certain morals and attitudes. If these qualities are not being instilled at this age — a time that is essential to forming our person — what hope is there for the future?

Some people live life too self-obsessed. Others have an extreme lack of concern for other individuals. But regardless of the reason, we as a society need to start remembering our fellow human beings. Respect other people's belongings, privacy and space. Try asking people how they are and actually listen to their answer. Practice good conversational skills and be polite to peers, as well as complete strangers. Civility may be becoming as old fashioned as chivalry, but it is still possible to reverse this growing trend. Remember the saying preached to us as children: "A little kindness goes a long way." In a perfect world, society would take these words and live by them.

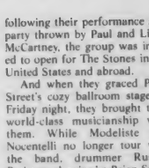
Northampton gets funky

The Meters bring nearly 40 years of funk to Pearl Street

By Bradley Farberman
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Needless to say, the people moved when the funky Meters brought their Crescent City gumbo to Pearl Street's ballroom last Friday. The fabled New Orleans-based quartet stretched out during their stop, kickin' all the hits for their kind, Massachusetts brethren.

The ensemble laid down one long, sinuous set of music for an enthusiastic audience; their patented blend of funky soul music eased the eager ears of fans young and old, lending rhythm to the whitest of dancers.



And their expertise in this sphere of influence is hardly the stuff of happenstance; they've been at it since 1967.

Art Neville's chunky organ, George Porter, Jr.'s insistent bass lines, Joseph "Zigaboo" Modeliste's sly drums and Leo Nocentelli's chicken-scratch guitar first combined in that year to turn the world of rhythm and blues on its ear. When early, largely instrumental singles like "Sophisticated Cissy," "Cissy Strut," "Ease Back" and "Look-Ka Py Py" began to climb the charts, big names took notice.

Names like Dr. John, Paul McCartney and The Rolling Stones. The Meters backed the good doctor on his biggest hit to date, "Right Place Wrong Time;" following their performance at a party thrown by Paul and Linda McCartney, the group was invited to open for The Stones in the United States and abroad.

And when they graced Pearl Street's cozy ballroom stage on Friday night, they brought their world-class musicianship with them. While Modeliste and Nocentelli no longer tour with the band, drummer Russell Batiste and guitarist Brian Stoltz more than occupy the spaces they abandoned. They bring a fresh energy to a timeless repertoire of bouncy, feel-good tunes.

Rechristened the funky Meters, the group tore into their set with "Here Comes The Meter Man," a cut off their first album. The rollicking, heavily syncopated piece got the crowd moving immediately, leaving little doubt as to the majesty that is the funky Meters. Sly and the Family Stone's "Sing A Simple Song," followed and segued seamlessly into the Meters' original "Funky Miracle." The pairing of these tunes was an inspired union of pieces that have remained in the group's catalog for more than 30 years; the vibrancy and playfulness with which they executed the short medley belied the age of the performers onstage.

Staple "People Say" popped up soon afterward, inciting a tremendous roar of approval from the crowd. Porter sang lead on this one, a tune that deals with the politics of class and economic standing. "The rich is getting richer," he sang. "And the poor is getting poor."

The instrumental bombast of "Groovy Lady" was next, and quickly followed up by a raucous reading of Dylan's "Rainy Day Women #12 and 35," a notorious crowd favorite. Its chorus, which decrees "everybody must get stoned," was more than appropriate for talented drummer Batiste, who smoked weed (or something like it) onstage.

The biggest offstage response of the night, however, was reserved for a special tune. When the boys unveiled "Cissy Strut," the crowd danced like it would never dance again. The song, a veritable calling card for funk, tore down the house.

New Orleans' favorite sons encored with "Hey Pocky Way," an original made popular by The Grateful Dead. The lyrics of said tune will ring true for any music lover: "Feel good, music/ I've been told/ Is good for your body/ Good for your soul."

Do yourself a favor. If the Funky Meters come to your neck of the woods, do not decline their open invitation to get down.

Brockton's Fuller museum gets crafty

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

BROCKTON — Gretchen Keyworth calls craft the "most important art discipline that is happening today." So important, that the Fuller Museum of Art is changing its mission, and its name.

When the Fuller Craft Museum opens Sunday, it will be among just a handful of contemporary craft museums in the nation. And when they say they're taking a hands-on approach to change, they mean it.

By summer, the museum will offer visitors white gloves at the entrance so they can touch selected works. A "Discovery Gallery," to open this fall, will feature clay, wood and fiber to let patrons experiment like the pros.

"Everything is being reinvented," said Keyworth, the museum's executive director and chief curator. "In most museums, it's hands off. It's part of our mission to reach out, to be open, to let the art touch you. There's no other like it in New England."

To get things started, the "Perfect Collection" is on exhibit through July 3. It's a show of works by master artists from local private collections that rarely are seen by the public. Architect Graham Gund and Susan Paine, who is president of the Museum of Fine Arts board, are among the collectors.

The art includes studio furniture by Judy McKie and Wendell Castle, ceramic by Beatrice Wood, and glass by William Morris. And yes, it is art, says Keyworth.

"People seem to have a need to categorize things," she said. "This is all art. When you walk into the Museum of Fine Arts and you go look at the Japanese porcelains, you don't see people standing in front of those having this dialogue

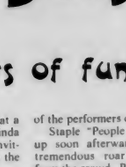
Willis sequel goes a yard too far



By Ryan Aubert
Collegian Staff

Everybody knows that sequels are never better than the original. But when the original is already mediocre, the sequel has nowhere to go except down into the depths of dreadfully awful. This is exactly how "The Whole Ten Yards" stacks up.

Its predecessor, "The Whole Nine Yards" was released in 2000 and was an OK mobster comedy — not a bad movie, not a wonderful movie — just mediocre. It was a weak hit, making around $57 million. The movie provided laughs here and there, but wasn't memorable. It starred Bruce Willis as Jimmy "The Tulip" Tudeski, an eccentric hitman who ratted on his mob boss Yanni (Kevin Pollack). With a price on his head, The Tulip moved into the suburbs, right next door to paranoid dentist Nick "Oz" Oseransky (Matthew Perry). The plot unfolds and antics ensue when Oz is sent to Chicago by his wife to try and sell the location of Tudeski to the mob.

"The Whole Ten Yards" presumably happens a few years after the original romp and brings back the original cast. Tudeski is a little bit crazy and is now living in Mexico, far away from the Hungarian mob. He cooks, cleans and is an all around good housewife.

Apparently, this is a (far-fetched) cover-up. His wife, Jill (Amanda Peet), is a hit-woman in training who can't seem to actually kill her targets because the victims fall out of windows. Oz is now married to Tudeski's ex-wife Cynthia (Natasha Henstridge). After the mob kidnaps Cynthia, Oz treks to Mexico for some help from The Tulip to find his beloved wife.

From there, the plot gets so convoluted that the audience gets lost. Actions happen without really any context or explanation. It seems as if the film was made on the spot, with screenwriters writing each scene right before they were shot, hoping that in editing everything would come together.

Well, it doesn't. By the end of the movie, Oz says, "What is going on here?" and audiences share the same sentiments.

There should be a saying in Hollywood that goes something like this: an ample amount of big name actors does not make a good movie. The big draw for making this sequel was probably having Willis and Perry back in their roles. Sure, they're big name actors, but if the writing, plot and laughs aren't there, then paying moviegoers know better.

So minimum is the amount of laughs throughout the movie that it seems wrong for it to even be called a comedy. Most of the jokes aren't funny, although the actors try very hard — too hard in fact. Every character is over-the-top and archetypal in their roles. Thus, the audience can guess what joke is coming next. Couple that with the confusing plot and the movie becomes a string of non-funny jokes by lackluster characters.

There are a few saving graces for this film and from it receiving an "F." First are the chickens. Yes, the chickens. The Tulip cares very much for his chickens, and an accident with one becomes very funny. It is sad though, when the funniest part of a movie is the animal actors.

The other saving grace — depending on your tastes — is Perry. Perry is Chandler-esque in his exuberant, whiny way throughout the film. Some people like Perry's humor, and others don't. His character usually provides the few laughs in the film, next to the chickens of course.

Did we really need a sequel to "The Whole Nine Yards"? The answer is a resounding no, exhibited by the film's dismal $6.68 million box office showing last weekend.

Autopilot takes off with 'Make A Sound'

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

For a new band, Autopilot Off has a pretty decent track record. The neo-punk rockers have released only one EP, yet it was enough to earn them admirers form the top echelons of modern punk elite; AFI, Good Charlotte and Sum 41 are among the many bands who have championed the group and hand-picked them to open at tours. Even Tim Armstrong, lead vocalist for DIY punk stalwarts Rancid, helped the band write two tracks on their full-length debut, "Make A Sound."

So, after all the hype that surrounds the New York-state quartet dies down, one question is left: "Are they worth it?"

And the short answer is, yes — sort of. The group — their name is an existential command to live life rather than float through it — plays in the sweet spot somewhere between Sum 41 and Thursday. They're kind of poppy and kind of punky, yet never, ever, pop-punk. They approach the heavy, hard, shattering crunch of hardcore without ever fully embracing it; there's just enough traditionalist pop catchiness and too little of the purposefully strident vocals to fall into the NYHC banner. Singer Chris Johnson shies away from the adenoidal vocals that typically are associated with this kind of music, in favor of a chesty, deep baritone. They color their style enough to avoid sounding like anyone other than Autopilot Off.

Yet, "Make A Sound" can get awfully samey sounding after awhile. One track after another trudges through the same pop-core mud, eventually blending together into one thunderous whole. The music is tight and well-constructed, with thick, glorious basslines, gritty guitar riffs and the right pummeling drum sound, all payed with the right melodic touches. But while Autopilot Off manage to separate themselves from the rest of the punk crowd, they keep managing to sound like themselves.

There are a few variations here and there: the very Rancid-like marble-mouthed vocals on "Blind Truth" (not surprising as Armstrong co-wrote it) and the semi-acoustic balladry of "I Know You're Waiting" and "Divine Intervention."

Autopilot Off writes with more maturity then most other pop-punk outfits, who generally like to trade in on high school heartbreak even when they are well into their 20s. In interviews past, the band have said that their music centers around the theme of uncertainitiy. The music may have listeners rocking out in their bedrooms, but the lyrical content is certainly more thoughtful and contempiative than is typically fashioned. "The 12th Day" takes another look back at Sept. 11, with poesy about how the "concrete rain/shatters windowpanes." "Blessed By A Nightmare" stares down the barrel of a shotgun, while "The Cicada Song" opens with "Tonight I have decided that there's only one way out/ and I tried so hard to fight it but that there's only one way out." Heavy stuff.

There's a wealth of hooks sprouting up like weeds through APO's heft. The group may have opted for a harder crunch than their peers, but they have developed a taste for the same commercial sensibility. "Byron Black" is the best song that labelmates Hoobastank never recorded; "I Know You're Waiting" seems ideally suited for radio play, with its slick balance of acoustic and electric elements and romantic sentiment.

Autopilot Off have genuine promise in their brand of rock, with solid musicianship and a decent lead singer (although, he can at times be strident when reaching for the high notes.) It's just that "Make A Sound" has a clammy, claustrophobic feel to it — as if you're hearing the same song throughout the majority of the album. They have promise, but they need to learn a little more about variety.

Autopilot Off make a bold satement with their debut LP "Make A Sound." The band combines punk-rock and pop sounds to create a unique disc.

of 'is this art or this craft?' They're objects. A lot of the interesting art being done today is object-driven."

The museum was founded as the Brockton Art Center in 1969 with money bequested by Brockton geologist Myron L. Fuller. Designed by architect J. Timothy Anderson, it's located on 22 acres of woodlands and overlooks Upper Porter's Pond.

A first impression is the museum could well be in the Berkshires or Vermont, not in a hardscrabble city best known for its champion boxers, Rocky Marciano and Marvin Hagler.

Andrew Maydoney, a museum board member, knows about reputations. He grew up in Mattapan, a working class section of Boston, and had a "great experience" there. Similarly, he said he knows Brockton "does not have the best reputation in the world," but that it's overcoming that challenge.

"We think the museum is one significant opportunity for that city to show how terrific it is," said Maydoney, vice president of consulting firm Sametz Blackstone Associates.

Contemporary craft is also improving its image in the art world, he said. Craft museums are opening near San Francisco and Seattle. Existing museums include the Museum of Art and Design in New York, the Racine Art Museum in Racine, Wis., the Mint Museum in Charlotte, N.C., and the Renwick Gallery at the Smithsonian Institution In Washington.

"It's a pretty vibrant movement right now," he said, noting that he likes how the discipline takes the common, like teapots and chairs, and makes them uncommon.

Keyworth said the key is the personal attachment.

"People have a personal connection to an object that's stronger than a painting," she said. "A painting is very removed. You stand back from it. You observe it. With these pieces, they are used. They are in people's homes. They are part of everyday living."

totally supportive of myself, the guys, and everyone around him."

Shay isn't the only member of the UMass lacrosse family in the ranks at Yale either. 2002 graduate Dan Paccione, who currently plays for the MILL3 Long Island Lizards, is also an assistant on Shay's staff.

Cannella and Shay will have a chance to reminisce on old times tomorrow, when the 6-4 Minutemen travel to New Haven, Conn. to face the 4-5 Bulldogs. It is a tale of two teams headed in opposite directions. While the Minutemen have cruised to a four-game win streak, including a 17-8 victory at Penn State on April 3, and a 16-4 rout of Manhattan last Friday night at home, the Bulldogs started off the season with four straight wins, but have since lost their last five.

Included in the slide is Wednesday's 12-9 loss to Albany, in which the Great Danes scored seven straight goals after trailing 7-5 in the third quarter. The Bulldogs still have some bite, though, as two of the losses were by one goal, and junior Seth Goldberg has scored 25 goals and six assists in nine games this year. In goal, freshman Jordan Ellis is averaging 11.48 goals allowed, but has faced over 20 shots on goal per game.

At the X, senior Ryan Capilupi has won 85 of 157 face-offs, backed up by sophomore Dan Kallaugher, who has won 30 of 56 draws. They'll match up against a hot hand on the UMass side, though. Junior Dane Collins has won 96 of his 185 draws this season, and his last performance was one of his best. Collins dominated at the X, winning 14 of 19 face-offs to help the Minutemen keep the pressure on Manhattan.

Women's lax targets Owls

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

The UMass Minutewomen lacrosse team (3-8, 1-2 A-10) may have their entire season riding on Sunday's Atlantic 10 match-up with the Temple Owls (5-6, 2-1 A-10). This game is a rematch of last season's Atlantic 10 championship game that Temple won 15-9.

The game will be played at Garber Field at noon where the Minutewomen will try to improve their 1-3 home record this season. Temple is 2-2 away from Philadelphia.

UMass is currently tied with St. Bonaventure for fifth place in the Atlantic 10 standings, one game behind Temple, Richmond and Duquesne. Only the top four teams earn a bid to play in the Atlantic 10 tournament May 7-8.

The Minutewomen are in danger of not playing in the postseason for the first time in seven years, but postseason visions aren't unrealistic due to the balance in the conference so far this year.

Tracey Drown, the team leader in assists and points, understands the magnitude of this game, simply stating, "Sunday is do or die."

UMass is coming off a come-from-behind 17-15 road win over non-conference opponent Albany on Wednesday. The game was made up from its original March 17 date.

UMass rallied with five consecutive goals after trailing 10-5 in the first half, but they found themselves trailing again when Alexis DiDomenico put the Great Danes ahead 14-13 with under seven minutes to play.

UMass went on to score four consecutive goals, three of them coming in a 90-second period, to lock up a hard fought victory. Hope Zelinger scored six times and added an assist for the Minutewomen. Kerri Connerty chipped in with two goals and four assists, and defensive specialist Kristin St. Hilaire picked up seven ground balls and caused a turnover.

Temple is coming off a 23-4 shellacking of Lafayette on Wednesday. Senior Tiffany Pulaski led the way with 10 goals and tied a 20-year-old school record with 12 total points in a single game.

Pulaski leads the Owls with 40 total points and 34 goals on the season. Corey Leader is the second leading scorer with 18 goals and 10 assists for 28 total points.

Even though UMass lost 12 letter winners from last season's championship game lineup to Temple's nine, the Minutewomen should clearly have revenge in mind.

UMass coach Carrie Bolduc put her team's objective very bluntly.

"There is a clear and obvious understanding by the team of what we need to do against Temple."

Canadiens crush Bruins

By Mark Pratt
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Saku Koivu had a goal and two assists, and Jose Theodore made 43 saves Thursday night, helping the Montreal Canadiens stay alive in the playoffs with a 5-1 victory over the Boston Bruins.

The Canadiens trail the best-of-seven series 3-2 and will host Game 6 on Saturday night.

Montreal	5
Boston	1

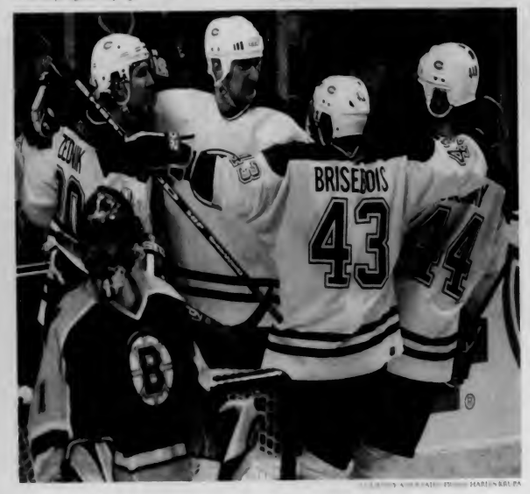
Montreal scored two power-play goals, but the Bruins continued to struggle with the man advantage. Boston was 0-for-4 on Thursday and is 2-for-22 in the series.

Koivu had a hand in both of Montreal's power-play goals. He scored on a rebound at 8:44 of the third period to make it 4-1 when the Canadiens had a two-man advantage.

Koivu also assisted on Craig Rivet's power-play goal at 6:34 of the third that made it 5-1. Rivet beat Bruins goalie Andrew Raycroft with a long slap shot.

The Bruins applied most of the early pressure, but Theodore held them off. The Canadiens scored on a quick counterattack at 14:17 of the first period. Jason Ward sent Yanic Perreault in alone and his shot deflected off of Raycroft's pads and inside the far post.

The Bruins' best scoring chance of the period came with just under 12 minutes left when Dan McGillis hit the post with a shot from the left point.



The Canadiens took a 2-0 lead at 12:21 of the second period on a three-on-two break. Richard Zednik won the puck at center ice, passed to Koivu on his left. Koivu then made a cross-ice pass to Alex Kovalev, who scored his fourth goal of the series.

Kovalev was the goat in Game 4, when after he was slashed in the second overtime he stopped playing and shook his injured wrist. He turned over the puck and then collided with teammate Sheldon Souray, which allowed Glen Murray to skate in on a breakaway and score the winning goal.

The Canadiens almost made it 3-0 Thursday when Raycroft was caught out of position. Pierre Dagenais had a clean shot at an empty net, but Bruins forward Sergei Samsonov threw himself in front of the puck and it deflected off his body.

Zednik eventually gave Montreal a three-goal advantage at 16:35 of the third period, just after the Bruins killed off a four-minute power play. Zednik took advantage of a turnover in the Bruins zone, skated in alone — with Joe Thornton clutching his jersey — and backhanded the puck past Raycroft.

The Bruins finally broke through at 11:37 of the third when Nick Boynton found Murray to the right of the Montreal net and Murray slapped a shot into the open net.

The Montreal Canadiens celebrate Saku Koivu's third-period goal, their fourth of the game, as Boston Bruins goalie Andrew Raycroft looks away during their NHL playoff game in Boston, yesterday. The Canadiens dominated the Bruins in their 5-1 win, but trail 3-2 in the series.

Minutemen play a familiar mentor

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's lacrosse family is a large one, with members scattered all over the country. The family includes players and coaches in Major League Lacrosse, like 2003 graduates Chris Fiore and Kevin Leveille — both playing for Boston, as well as 1989 graduate and legendary goaltender Sal LoCascio, who currently coaches the Philadelphia Barrage. And there are plenty more in the college ranks.

Andy Shay is a member of the family. Currently the head coach of the Yale Bulldogs, Shay spent the last four seasons prior to 2004 pacing the sideline alongside UMass head coach Greg Cannella, as the Minutemen's defensive and recruiting coordinator. The 1994 Le Moyne graduate took the helm at Yale after a tumultuous year at New Haven.

On Jan. 14, 2003, head coach Mike Waldvogel left the Bulldogs, eventually resigning on Jan. 30 as a departmental investigation was opened to examine his recruiting practices. Just three days later, senior Eric Wenzel, a standout goaltender, was seriously injured in a car crash that killed four Yale students. Wenzel has made a full recovery, and is now an assistant under Shay, but never played in his senior season.

Cannella said he's not surprised that Shay was able to keep things going at Yale.

"Obviously Andy is a heck of a coach, he did a great job while he was here, and I have full confidence that he will do a great job at Yale," Cannella said. "He wouldn't be where he is if he were not a great coach."

Shay was plucked from the UMass sideline after four years that saw the Minutemen win two Eastern College Athletic Conference championships, and two appearances in the NCAA tournament. But it was a move that Cannella was expecting.

"I knew it would be there, sooner than later. I thought it was going to be the year before, because he presents himself so well, and he's so well respected within the lacrosse coaching circles," Cannella said.

"He brings a lot more to the table than just coaching. The relationships he had with the guys off the field were outstanding. Just the way he approaches his job was outstanding. He was 100 percent full-go.

Minutewomen blank Boston College

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

KJ Kelley is making a name for herself very quickly.

In the bottom of the third inning in the Minutewomen's affair with Boston College yesterday, the sophomore third baseman set a new UMass record when she launched a two-run shot over the centerfield wall for her twelfth home run of the year. Brandi Cross previously set the home run record in 2003.

BC	0

That was all they needed, as the Maroon and White picked up two more runs in the fifth to seal off a 4-0 defeat of the Eagles (24-16).

Kelli Arnold (10-5) enjoyed a stellar 21st birthday on the mound for the Minutewomen (20-11), pitching a complete game and recording her fourth shutout of the season, allowing just three hits and one walk in the effort.

"I thought [Kelli] did a great job today," coach Elaine Sortino said. "She did a great job moving the ball around and the crosswind was very tough today. I thought her change-up was spotty in the beginning, but she came back with it."

The game started off slowly for both teams. Through the first two innings neither team had scored a run, each registering just one hit. That would all change in the bottom of the third.

Junior Hilary Puglia reached first base on a hit that slipped by the middle infield. Candice Molinari was up next, and Puglia would reach second following a sacrifice bunt laid down by the freshman.

Then came Kelley to the plate. With a 2-0 count, the patient third baseman saw her pitch, and swung with authority. The result was a smashing line drive over the centerfield wall, driving home Puglia to make it a 2-0 game.

"It felt good. I didn't think it was going to be a homerun, just a shot in the gap, so it really took me by surprise," Kelley said. "It was exciting just like every homerun that you hit or hit that you get is exciting. I love it."

As always, the defense shone through, with some especially great play coming in the top of the fourth.

What could have resulted in extra bases for the Eagles' Jaqui Goodchild instead resulted in an out, thanks to Molinari. With the ball looking to perhaps ricochet off the fence, the freshman took a step onto the warning track and extended her arms just in time to make the saving catch.

"It was a very drastic play," Sortino said. "Molinari, Hilary [Puglia] and the entire outfield had a great game. To credit our outfield, we must have spent more than half an hour working on going back for the ball and staying with it. These kids work really hard and I'm happy for them when they make plays like that."

The Minutewomen picked up two more insurance runs in the bottom of the fifth. Michelle Daly was pulled in the fifth for the Eagles, replaced by Takae Malandris, a move that backfired almost immediately.

Puglia scored home Kristi Stefanoni with a single through the middle, advancing Denise Denis to third. Lesley Ferrara stepped in to pinch-hit for Molinari, who then stepped in at first after Ferrara's single. Denis was thrown out at home on the play.

Molinari immediately got to work, stealing second. Puglia took lead from her teammate's success and stole home for the fourth and final run on the day. The inning ended when Molinari was tagged out at third stealing, sliding over the bag for the out.

KJ Kelly breaks home run record

By Todd Foster
Collegian Staff

On Apr. 13, 2003, Brandi Cross smashed her 10th homerun over the right center fence. The roundtripper gave the senior first baseman the new single season homerun record, finishing the season with 11. As she made her way back to the dugout, she walked by a powerful freshman in the on-deck circle. That freshman was KJ Kelley, who would erase her record one year and two days later.

"Brandi was a great idol," Kelley said. "I watched her closely and saw what she did like taking it slowly and relaxing. There are a lot of veterans I've watch at the plate and how they prepare themselves. You learn from who you watch."

The 5-foot-8 third baseman record-breaking homerun demonstrated a typical at-bat for the power hitter. Her keen eye watched the first two pitches miss the strike zone. The third pitch, an outside fastball, was the one she wanted and she took it. It was a hard line drive with hardly any trajectory, but had enough power behind it to sail far over the right center fence.

Kelley came onto the UMass scene with eight homeruns in freshman season after being a four-year letterwinner at Rainer (Ore.) High School. Her freshman total placed her fourth and the only players ahead of her at the time were Scooter Wheeler and Brandi Cross, who share the career record of 26 homeruns.

"I'm not concentrating on getting the [career homerun] record right now," Kelley said. "Yes, I have a chance to get it this year, but you know what? I'm a sophomore so I've got time. If I don't get the record, I'm not going to act like my career is over. It would be nice to get record though, because I think everyone likes to get records."

By looking at the homerun lists, Kelley is a rare power hitter that UMass has only seen a few times. Wheeler and Cross are the two most recent, who were teammates in the 1999 and 2000 seasons, and are only other players with 20 or more homers in their careers. Kelley is the quickest UMass player to reach the 20-homerun plateau, taking only 85 games opposed to Cross, who took 198 games.

"She's got to be top five," Head Coach Elaine Sortino said. "She's very strong, but what she learned to do was how to stay on the ball. That's why she's hitting the ball so far, because she's on it for a long time.

She worked on that this off-season and finally figured it out. She's just starting to learn how to use her lower body and you'll see that probably come around by next year.

By next year, she might hit one off the library.

Community remembers Leaman

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

If there was ever a human face of UMass, that face was Jack Leaman.

The former Massachusetts basketball coach and broadcaster, who also coached both the UMass and Stockbridge golf teams, was honored by over 1,000 people at a memorial service on Sunday, held inside the Curry Hicks Cage, where he coached the Minuteman basketball team to national prominence.

The influence of Mr. Leaman, who died on March 6, could be seen in the broad range of people who attended the service. Perhaps Mr. Leaman's most famous protégé, hall of famer Julius Erving, was among the speakers at the service, and along with current Boston College coach Al Skinner, represented a multitude of former players who were in attendance.

Both Erving and Skinner gave emotional speeches about their experiences under Mr. Leaman. Erving, who played just two seasons at UMass before moving on to professional stardom, summed up his remarks by simply saying, "Goodbye coach, I love you."

Former UMass coach John Calipari also spoke at the service, reflecting on Mr. Leaman's constant involvement with the basketball program. Mr. Leaman would often come to Calipari during his tenure in Amherst, asking him to "get a cup of coffee," which was Mr. Leaman's code for talking about basketball strategy and coaching.

'Relay for Life' helps fight cancer

Hundreds of sponsored walkers travel Pratt Field as part of the American Cancer Society's "Relay for Life." The overnight event raises money every year for cancer research.

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

More than 500 students from the Five College area laced up their sneakers this weekend and walked overnight at Amherst College, taking part in the American Cancer Society's "Relay for Life."

The event, designed to raise money for cancer, took place at Pratt Field on Friday afternoon and into Saturday morning.

Erin McDonald, communication director for Relay for Life has played a strong role in the American Cancer Society and also has been active in the second annual Relay for Life.

"Relay for Life is a team event where participants run or walk around a track in relay-style shifts to celebrate the hope that cancer will be beaten," McDonald said in a press release. "The members take turns circling the track throughout the day and night, enjoying great food, entertainment and camaraderie as they camp out and cheer on one another on during the fun-filled event."

Relay for Life is a national program but has recently targeted college audiences in its second year coming to the Amherst area.

Students have organized teams of 10 to 15, given themselves names and set out to raise money for cancer research, experimental medications and patient services.

McDonald who resides in Northampton, Mass., is in her fifth year working with Relay for Life.

"I think this is why we're all here because we've been touched by cancer and we do it for the organization and cause," she said.

The evening began with a chain of events that were both emotional and enthusiastic. The opening ceremony, which began promptly at 6:30 p.m. included speeches from students, letters from cancer survivors and culminated with a victory lap for all cancer survivors and caregivers.

UMass student Strates Frangules was diagnosed with Hodgkin's disease in August of 2001. He underwent four months of intense chemotherapy and beat his battle with the cancer.

"My family helped me throughout," he said. "I don't know what I'd do if I didn't have my family."

He received his treatment with the Jimmy Fund and Dana Farber in Boston.

"It feels good to be coming to these events and giving back to the people who helped me, and I just recently lost my grandfather to lung cancer and it's good to know that people are caring," he said.

Prince-Crampton cluster hosts international education night

By Sean Benson
Collegian Correspondent

Students, residential staff and faculty members gathered in the Prince International Lounge Thursday night for the third installment of "Around the World in 30 Days," a program designed to educate people about international nations.

The theme of the session was "Asia and the Middle East." The presentations were made by residents of the Prince-Crampton cluster, as well as by a University of Massachusetts professor.

The Prince-Crampton cluster is home to undergraduate and graduate students, visiting professors and exchange scholars representing 46 international countries and 28 U.S. states and territories.

"It's a very diverse population [living in the cluster] in terms of ages, ethnicities, nationalities, and fields of study," said Dr. Mohamed Good, residence director of the Prince-Crampton cluster. "With a community of that kind, we have to create programs that bring people together to create environments where people are able to communicate with one another."

The program "Around the World in 30 Days," now in its fifth year, is aimed at doing exactly that. Every Thursday night this month, presentations are made in the Prince International Lounge by international residents of the cluster and others in order to educate other students about their country and culture.

Martin Holman, a visiting assistant professor of Asian Languages and Literature at UMass, and Ben Botiller, a UMass graduate student, began the night with a presentation on Japanese theater. They discussed bunarku, a form of puppeteering that dates back to the 17th century, in addition to playing a shamisen, a string instrument used in bunarku.

UMass graduate student Lei Wang did a presentation on her home country, China. She discussed Chinese food, dress, gardening practices, Chinese tea, silk, as well as the religion of Daoism and interesting places to visit in China.

Meera Rajani, a UMass undergraduate student, contributed with a presentation on her native country of India. She educated the audience on different aspects of Indian culture, including its 19 different languages, the importance of religion in India and the significance of the media in India.

> "One of the goals of the program is to create an environment where this diverse community can learn from one another."
> – Dr. Mohamed Good, residence director of the Prince-Crampton cluster

UMass undergraduate students Shahzad Sadozai and Binnish Butt made a presentation on the culture, history, and geography of Pakistan. They discussed many characteristics of Pakistan, including Pakistani dress, religion and its famous cricket team. They also addressed misconceptions about the practice of arranged marriages in Pakistani culture and the structure of Pakistani families.

Arthur LaPlante, a UMass graduate student, also gave his personal story of how he learned about Zen meditation and Asian martial arts. He demonstrated how to breathe correctly when fighting as well as some martial arts combination moves.

After each presentation there was a question and answer session.

"One of the goals of the program is to create an environment where this diverse community can learn from one another," Good said. In addition, he said the program "provides international students with an education about the diversity of the U.S."

"I enjoy coming to this. You learn something new every week," said Chambi Chachage, an international exchange student and resident of the Prince-Crampton cluster.

The final installment of the program will be presented Thursday night in the Prince-Crampton International Lounge at 8 p.m.

Thursday evening at the Malcolm X Cultural Center students from the African, Latino, Asian/Pacific Islander and Native American community came together show their support for Student Government Association presidential candidate Eduardo Bustamante.

"Let's talk about it," an open panel discussion held by the Beta Beta chapter of Iota Phi Theta Fraternity Inc. gave students a chance to get information about what is happening with the elections, as well as to voice their opinions about the controversy.

"I think they're pretty smart," said Qasim Laroche, a junior engineering major, referring to the Senate's decision not to ratify the first election results which were won by Bustamante. "They picked a process that they could argue as unconstitutional if they didn't like who won."

Throughout the meeting the sentiment from the students that the SGA doesn't pay attention to the voice of the ALANA community, one of the topics that came to light was the SGA meeting on March 31 when the decision was made not to ratify the elections.

"They wouldn't even acknowledge the fact that Eddie won," said Kara Greene, a senior and the president of the Black Student Union. "It was as if they had their minds made up that they didn't want him in there before anyone even said anything."

The students at the meeting discussed many issues that they felt were direct contributions to the relationship of the ALANA community and the SGA.

"Our issues are never talked about," said Sen. Aiysha Cooper. "Every year it's something, there are always problems with elections here and until now they've always found a way to ratify

Campus poker tournament delayed by administration

By Joseph Padell
Collegian Correspondent

University of Massachusetts administrators placed a hold on poker tournaments on campus this week until their legality is established.

"Texas Hold 'em," the tournament in question, is a poker variant popular among college students.

"This is only my first year, but I would imagine that it got popular over this summer, when it got televised on ESPN with the World Series of Poker," said Sashanka Dwivedula, a freshman majoring in computer science. He plays poker competitively once a week.

It is this popularity that the Pierpont-Moore house council hoped to tap into when it planned a campus-wide poker tournament for the beginning of May.

"I've been playing cards for a long time and run tournaments like this with 50 to 100 people in my town," said Aaron Daniels, Pierpont-Moore House Council president. "I wanted to bring that experience to UMass and create an event that all students could enjoy."

The Pierpont-Moore House Council understood there could be legal issues surrounding a tournament, but were confident that they had all been addressed.

"I myself read all of the Massachusetts gaming laws," said Daniels. "And because 'hold 'em' is a game of skill, not chance, which is prohibited, as far as I knew we were not doing anything illegal."

UMass administrators were not quite as confident however, and suggested last Wednesday that the Pierpont-Moore House Council it."

"We were ripped off," Bustamante said. "Everything is political, and this is just another one of those things. ... Students here are ready to up and fight for their rights, and if you have that then change will come."

Also during the meeting, students took time to brainstorm on how to make the SGA more effective for all students. Some suggestions that were presented were for better checks and balances of the SGA, as well as for ALANA Registered Student Organi-zations to make a stronger effort to encourage students of color to involve themselves in the SGA.

"We as community have the power to put who we want into office, and because of this we need to come together," said Emmanuel Sequin, a sophomore engineering major. "Our community is very tight knit and if we go about it correctly we have the power to see change in campus politics for as long as we want."

Louis Joseph, vice president of the Beta Beta chapter of Iota Phi Theta said that it was important to put on this event because students need to understand why they should support a candidate who represents their voice.

"There are a lot of changes that need to happen at this school and it starts by educating students of these issues that influence their lives," he said. "There cannot be a movement if no one is willing to motivate others to move."

victory lap among other survivors also stayed through the night with UMass's WMUA and provided music throughout the events.

Teams came prepared with tents, sleeping bags and refreshments, even though most did not sleep.

One UMass team, dubbed 'Mullet Patrol', came decked out in trucker hats and mullet wigs. Marc D'Amore, who has been fundraising with his team since December said that after spreading the word about the event, his team grew so large with eager participants, that he made two teams.

"Everyone wanted to join," he said. " And that's why we made two teams."

D'Amore lost two grandparents to cancer and his mother had run teams in the past and he wanted to make a difference too.

"We wanted to come up with a name that would be funny," he said. "And we all went to the Salvation Army to get our hats and outfits."

Later in the evening, and perhaps the most anticipated event among the walkers, was the lighting of the luminaries. Sponsors and donators had the opportunity to purchase a candle either in memory of a cancer victim or in honor of a cancer survivor. At 9 p.m., all of the luminaries were lit, some with personal touches around them like cards and flowers. The candles remained lit throughout the walk.

UMass students Nicole Lohr, Melissa Ivanoski and Daniel Lee were co-chairpersons for the event and were in charge of team recruitment, supervising publicity logistics and fundraising. Lohr lost her father to cancer, and Ivanoski's mother is a cancer. They both said it was important to them to help out.

"I volunteered last year and I saw the impact it made on the people who participated and on the survivors," Lohr said. "I felt compelled to take an active role in bringing the relay to UMass."

It was also not just the students that were involved, but also the entire community.

"It was wonderful to see the amount of support we received from the local community. Restaurants donated food, along with gift certificates to use as prizes," Ivanoski said. "Local college bands offered their time by playing during the event. Carnival games were also donated for the event ... The support was fantastic!"

The teams exceeded their goals for this year, raising over $35,000 for cancer research, patient assistance and experimental drugs.

Erving, Calipari honor coach Leaman

March 6, was a presence in UMass athletics for more than 40 years.

Though he resigned as the coach of the Minutemen over 20 years ago, Mr. Leaman remained an active member of UMass sports, taking on the helm of the women's basketball team for the 1986-87 season, as well as the Stockbridge School of Agriculture's golf team.

In 1994, Mr. Leaman became the color analyst for UMass men's basketball, teaming with play-by-play announcers George Miller, Marc Vandermeer and Bob Behler. He remained the color broadcaster until the day he died, and his coaching instincts and candor on the air were a hallmark of UMass radio broadcasts.

Mr. Leaman was very much a renaissance man, attending every UMass sporting event he could manage, and often appearing for a quick dinner and chat before UMass hockey games, basketball games and football games.

His advice stretched beyond the boundaries of UMass, as well. Calipari mentioned during his speech that he spoke with Mr. Leaman before the 2003-04 season. It turned out that Calipari wanted to get the cup of coffee, and talk about Mr. Leaman's 1960s-era offense. Calipari said his Memphis Tigers ran that offensive set this season, leading them to the second round of the NCAA tournament.

UMass Chancellor John V. Lombardi was the emcee of the event. Although he has only been on the Amherst campus for over a year, Lombardi also had glowing words to say about Mr. Leaman.

"A university is not built by its buildings, it is not built by its curriculum," Lombardi said. "It is built by its people."

Behler, who has been the Minuteman basketball broadcaster for five years, told a story about Mr. Leaman at the Maui Invitational in 2002, when the Minutemen were participants in the elite preseason tourney. After a long day of basketball, Mr. Leaman and a number of other members of the UMass media drove to the coast of Maui to watch the sunset. A man came up to the group, and offered Mr. Leaman a marijuana cigarette. He declined.

"The rest of the night," Behler said, "Jack kept saying, 'that dude thought I was cool!'"

Former UMass Sports Information Director Dick Bresciani, now an official with the Boston Red Sox, was also among the speakers.

postpone the event.

"We told the students that it would be best to postpone the event until we could seek legal council," said Dawn Thompson, residential life director. "Sometimes these types of events need a permit."

Obtaining a permit to conduct a poker tournament could be difficult, however.

"There is really no way to get a gaming permit for an event such as this," a spokesperson at the Massachusetts Attorney General's office said. "This is because playing poker and gambling in general is against Massachusetts state law."

The University is currently licensed to run "Las Vegas" nights by the state lottery commission. Certain games of chance, including blackjack, craps and roulette, are allowed provided that no game of chance involves wagering of money, script or chips by one player against another player, according to administrative bulletins explaining the particulars of the University's license.

Poker is specifically prohibited by the terms of the University's current license. Failure to comply with these restrictions could result in this license being suspended or revoked, according to the bulletins.

Daniels is hopeful that a legal solution can be found, however.

"The tournament is either cancelled or postponed. We are trying to get a letter from the university attorney checking it out for us and if he says it's ok the event is back on," he said.

A maximum of 500 students would have been eligible to compete in the tournament, after paying a $10 entry fee. The top 55 students would have received cash prizes, ranging from $11.25 to $1305.

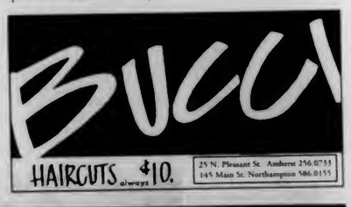
This would have made it the largest poker tournament ever held at UMass, as well as one of the most ambitious house council events in recent years, according to Caitlin Burbidge, Southwest area government secretary.

"House council events normally cater to between 50 and 150 in their living area maximum, not campus-wide like this is," she said. "I don't think anyone really understood what they were getting in for."

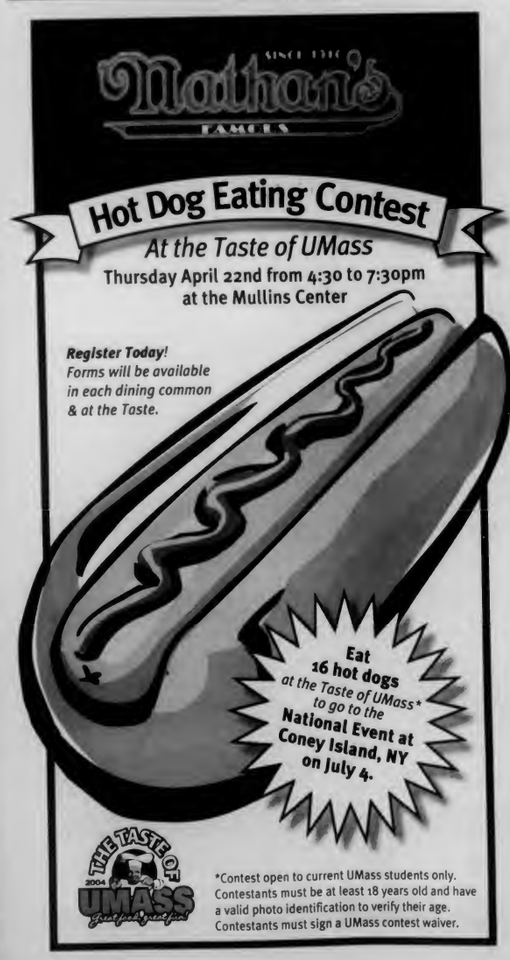
University Auxiliary Services is also in a position similar to the Pierpont-Moore House Council.

Auxiliary Services hosted a 30 person "Texas Hold 'em" tournament every Thursday night at the Bluewall. The top six players in each week's tournament received cash prizes. This event was mentioned in Michael Gargano, vice-chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life's spring email, sent to students April 5. Now the tournament is in question.

"It's something that caught my eye," Gargano said when questioned about legal issues surrounding the tournament. "My sense is that it is probably an activity that has to be reviewed and gone through the proper channels."



The possibility of future tournaments is by no means dead however. Daniels expressed a desire to try and work through any legal issues and make organized poker at UMass a reality.



"I would probably continue to try to put my best efforts into organizing an event like this," he said. "I think it can work."

Big fat adventure gone awry

Vardalos and Collette take a trip into the world of drag queens

By Lauren Freeman
Collegian Staff

Nia Vardalos who debuted as a screenwriter and lead actress with the charming comedy "My Big Fat Greek Wedding," makes another attempt at comedic prowess with "Connie and Carla."

'Connie and Carla'
Directed by Michael Lembeck
Starring Nia Vardalos, Toni Collette
Universal Studios
Rated PG-13
90 mins
Grade C+

Vardalos plays Connie and her sidekick Carla is played by Toni Collette ("The Hours," "Japanese Story"). The two ladies are an airport song-and-dance entertaining duo with snoring audiences and a Malioso boss. When they accidentally witness the mobster's dirty business they have to disappear from Chicago and hide from him. They go to Los Angeles and through a series of events they end up posing as two drag queens at a drag queen nightclub.

As their act becomes increasingly successful they risk the unveiling of their true identities to both the real drag queens who have grown to love them, and the mob boss who is searching the theater circuit nationwide for them.

The two actresses are wonderful together and luckily many of the scenes place them in close proximity to one another. These scenes are the most effective and comedic. Unfortunately, some of the scenes call for the two actresses to do their own thing and these scenes drag ... pun intended.

Part of this problem is due to the fact that Vardalos favors her own character Connie and so she includes many more scenes with Connie going solo and developing her own subplots while Carla is underutilized. At one point Carla complains to Connie, "Where have you been? I was shopping all day, alone at the mall." Sympathy resides with Carla, because as an audience, we too would have preferred that the two stuck together on screen.

Nia Vardalos, of "My Big Fat Greek Wedding" fame, returns to the big screen with "Connie and Carla." The film lacks the magic of her other projects and mid-way through it loses momentum.

The problem with this film is that the best jokes, acting and situations occur during the first half. About half way through the plot nose-dives into a too tidy resolution. When Connie and Carla make their spontaneous escape from Chicago and drive together across country the scenes are fluid, the humor consistent and the story is at its best. Unfortunately, this road trip doesn't last long and shortly after the characters land in LA and the humor of their self-appointed queen-dom wears thin the movie grows ugly, polluted roots.

The quirky gender-bending film is directed by Michael Lembeck, whose prolific career as a television sitcom director — including "My Two Dads," "Friends," "Coach," and "Ellen," — was appropriate for this "sitcomish" flick. This is not necessarily a compliment. His television mentality seems to have weakened the structure of this feature-length film. Sitcoms structurally involve setup of conflict and then a fairly quick and tidy resolution. That is why there is generally not much depth to the storylines attempted by comedic TV scripts.

There is simply not enough time in a half-hour, with commercials to boot, to treat a full story arch. There is little time wasted in between act one and act two. Things happen quickly and most of the humor is built upon by exploiting pre-established personality traits of lead characters. In "Connie and Carla" there was way too much time wasted in between developing the conflict and resolving it. What results is an insufficient time to resolve the conflicts that were setup and everything is resolved in the last ten minutes of the film.

Overall, "Connie and Carla" plays with the questionable notion of sexuality and gender that leaves its impression on anyone who has ever been attracted to another human being. Overdone, "after school special" themes such as being true to oneself and loving your body regardless of its shape and size are cleverly disguised here and may even seem fresh to an untrained viewer.

The film deals lightly with Peaches/Robert (Stephen Spinella), a real drag queen's life style and his relationship with his brother Jeff (David Duchovny) who is desperately trying to understand his brother's penchant for "playing dress up." However, the reality of this lifestyle is only dealt with on a surface level and a more explicit call for tolerance from those who might be hesitant to embrace this subculture is needed. We need a real conversation between the drag queen and his straight-acting brother, not just an embarrassed stare that eventually turns into an accepting one. What are these characters thinking about?

Part of the difficulty of most films about the drag lifestyle (except perhaps "Hedwig and the Angry Inch") is that the most important themes of identity and loving oneself are overshadowed by the shallow voyeuristic urge of the director (and perhaps the drag queens themselves) to parade the queens across the screen like some sort of parade of bright colors and lunks jewelry. Not enough attention is paid to the people underneath the clothes and makeup. Personally, as a female, I don't need to be reminded that I too can be fabulous in the right clothes and make up. That's old news and unwarranted.

What I really want to know is the backstory of these fabulous men. The struggles they have to endure daily and the humanity behind the disguises that women and drag queens alike are on some level subjected to. "Connie and Carla" just barely scratched the surface of the actual thematic potential that drawing a similarity between drag queens and women can accomplish.

That's one step in the right direction, let's take another step, shall we?

'Attempts on Her Life' brings mystery to UMass

This image is one of the limited clues the cast and crew of "Attempts on Her Life" have released to the public about the play.

The University of Massachusetts theater department is putting on a showing of Martin Crimp's play "Attempts on Her Life" tomorrow, Wednesday and Thursday at 8 p.m. in the Curtain Theater.

Attempts on Her Life
Curtain Theater
April 21-23
Free

The play's directors, actors, and dramaturg have all kept the actual subject of the show completely secret, and wouldn't give any hints to the Collegian. All of those involved in the show also wish to remain anonymous.

British playwright Crimp wrote "Attempts on Her Life" as an experimental piece of art that could allow directors to shape it into what they will. As for what the UMass production has in store for Crimp's work, theatergoers will only find out once they arrive.

Those involved with the production have opted to keep it shrouded in almost total secrecy in the hopes of intriguing adventurous audiences into seeing something unique.

The play will be free to the public, but tickets are on a first come, first serve basis. If you have read Crimp's play and are intrigued by what the production has to offer or are simply just titillated by the mystery surrounding the production, you are kindly — and enthusiastically — encouraged to check it out.

Toyota Prius offers an impressive alternative to the old standard

Spinning Your Wheels
Michael Magrath

America is a land of drivers. Sadly public transportation is inefficient and kind of dirty. Since recessions, record level fuel prices and a deteriorating environment have done virtually nothing to improve that, those who are deeply concerned about the earth, or are just genuinely cheap have some new options. Electric hybrid vehicles are the new wave of grass-roots revolution against big oil and the Toyota Prius is leading the march.

The 2004 Prius is rated at an astounding 55 miles per gallon combined fuel economy. How, you ask, does a sedan — competently capable of holding five adults — manage such a fantastic feat? The secret is Hybrid Synergy Drive, combined with Prius's Electronically Controlled Continuously Variable Transmission. Get it? No? Read on.

Hybrid Synergy Drive is an easy enough concept to grasp, there's one conventional motor, two electric motors and two batteries — one for driving the wheels, the other for powering 12-Volt accessories and on-board computers. At low speeds, the car runs on electric motors alone. Toyota calls this "Stealth Mode," the M113 military personnel carrier uses the same term for the same thing. When the time comes for acceleration, above say 14 mph, the drive-by-wire technology tells the gasoline engine to get its act in gear (figuratively speaking of course, the ECVT has no conventional gears) and the car goes smoothly to 60 in 9.8 seconds.

With all this zooming about, the batteries must be feeling a bit weak. Unlike the electric cars of just a few years ago, the Prius does not need to be plugged in, ever. Frankly I'd feel silly doing that. The "traction battery" in the Prius is a rechargeable Nickel-Metal-Hydride (NiMH) affair, like the ones in your Discman but slightly bigger. They charge by Regenerative Braking. It converts the kinetic energy of the cars motor in to electric energy that is stored back into the battery. You used all that energy getting to 60 in the first place, why not try to get some back?

The Prius, thanks to the ECVT, does not have the jerky shifts usually attributed to automatic transmissions. It consists primarily of a belt stretched over two cone shaped pulleys. The belt slides up and down the cones in a similar way that your 18-speed bike does, just replace the set gears with cones. With a supposedly infinite number of gear ratios the ECVT will keep the engine running at its most efficient, this is most noticeable when ascending large hills, a common practice living in a valley. Whereas a traditional automatic jerks between gears, the ECVT has much more specific tuneability and finds the ideal spot almost instantly.

Unlike its main competitor, the Honda Insight, the Prius is a perfectly useable daily driver. It has the same interior space of a Camry. With a lift back and 60/40 split rear seats the Prius can hold much larger objects than ordinary sedans; think bicycles, snowboards, a futon. Standard amenities include power windows and locks. Driver and front passenger multi-stage airbags. Anti-lock Brake System and traction control are also standard.

Also standard is the liquid crystal multi-information display panel with energy monitor (my fuel consumption, climate control, outside temperature and audio status).

Fuel consumption is the one you want to pay specific attention to. This tells you exactly how many miles per gallon you are consuming at any given time. This function is an inexhaustible source of entertainment, constantly trying to best other Prius drivers for best MPG.

With a well equipped base price of $20,810, combining excellent fuel economy with Toyota's proven reputation for quality and reliability, the Prius is a best buy for anyone looking to save a buck, or an ozone layer.

EDITORIAL OPINION

Later classes will benefit students

If there is one word to characterize University of Massachusetts students every school day morning, it is this: sleepy.

It's a common sight. Students, with caffeinated beverages in hand, stroll in to their morning classes on just a few hours of sleep and fight to stay awake. Heavy eyelids sometimes win the battle — even with some of the most ambitious students.

The problem is no different on college campuses across the nation. At Duke University in North Carolina, most students have avoided taking 8 a.m. classes in the past few years, opting instead for classes that started after 10 a.m. The result: the university eliminated 8 a.m. classes altogether.

Administrators couldn't get rid of all the morning classes or else classroom space would be an issue during the middle of the day, so there will be 8:30 a.m. classes. Still, the delay of classes is a smart move. It will be working with, rather than against, a college-age person's biological clock. Thanks to their internal clocks, college age students like to go to bed later and wake up later.

But just to make sure students understand the important of a good night's rest, the university is considering implementing orientation programs this fall that would educate them on the subject.

The issue has been a hot topic for years, but is gaining more attention as national surveys are showing that college students are getting less sleep than ever before. College students sleep an average of six to seven hours a night, down from seven to seven and a half in the 1980s. Experts say college-age people should get nine hours of sleep a night.

A decreased amount of sleep presumably means that students are doing more work and leaving less time to catch their Zs. An increasingly competitive workforce drives many students to push their bodies to the limit to score the best possible grades while juggling extra-curricular activities, sports and part-time jobs.

Oftentimes, earning a place on the Dean's List is synonymous with sacrificing a good night's sleep. Finishing endless papers, cramming for exams and working on projects forces ambitious students to stay up to the wee hours of the morning to ensure an excellent grade.

It's important for students to remember that, although earning good grades is important, sleep is an integral part to a person's health and should never be taken for granted. Getting adequate sleep each night decreases one's risk of getting sick and reduces stress levels.

UMass administrators should consider moving the start of classes. The answer to better grades and more attentive students may just be in a later morning wake-up call.

SEAL OF APPROVAL

The demise of 'The Simpsons'

Zach Oelschlegel

Remember the Super Bowl sandwiched in between the two Patriots championships? It was Tampa Bay versus Oakland, a grudge match of sorts because Tampa Bay coach Jon Gruden was coaching against the team he nearly took to the Super Bowl the year before.

You sat down to watch it with your friends, excited for another thrilling finish along the lines of Adam Vinatieri's game-winning kick in 2002. You ordered some pizza and wings from the Domino's two blocks away, ready to rumble. It was the Super Bowl. It's practically a national holiday; everyone watches the Super Bowl. You almost have to.

By halftime, Oakland is already getting crushed, 20-3. After another quarter, it was 34-10. It would go down as one of the worst Super Bowls ever.

And yet, you still watched it. You clung to it, hoping something would happen, like maybe Rich Gannon leading the Raiders to a couple quick scores to make the game a little more exciting. Unfortunately for your viewing pleasure, that didn't happen, and Tampa Bay went on to win 48-21. You left your living room, joking with your friends about how you had just wasted four hours of your life, and it's not even like the commercials were halfway decent enough to make up for an awful game.

Sound familiar? The idea of watching something out of sheer obligation? I've felt the same way when I watch "The Simpsons" for the last four years. I'll be sitting in my room on a Sunday night at 8 p.m., knowing that what I, and many others, consider to be the greatest show in the history of television is on.

But I hesitate to turn on the TV. I sit at my computer, telling myself I'm not going to turn it on because I don't want to let the reputation of what was "my" show be driven further into the ground.

I can't resist; maybe it'll be better this Sunday. These new ones can't be all that bad. Maybe Matt Groening will not have resorted to the obnoxious and horribly un-clever humor that has been draining the show for these last five years. Maybe I'll turn the TV off at 8:30 with that great feeling I would get back in my childhood days, and not with a groan of disappointment. Maybe.

It seems to me that the writers of "The Simpsons" have forgotten what originally made the show so great. The Simpsons were everything America didn't want to be, and at the same time, everything that America truly was.

What made "The Simpsons" different from other sitcoms was that the problems the family had were real. American families weren't like the Waltons or Cleavers. By being so abnormal to the American pop culture, the Simpsons were more normal than ever.

The Simpsons were everything America didn't want to be, and at the same time, everything that America truly was.

Every marriage had the problems of Marge and Homer. Homer ignores Marge and tries to be the man's man that his bar buddies tell him to be. Both Marge and Homer struggle with staying faithful, and the show puts it out there exactly because every couple grapples with it, in varying degrees. Who can forget the unforgettable episode where Marge nearly leaves Homer to be with the suave Frenchman Jacques? He was someone Homer could never be and at the same time the traits Jacques did not possess were exactly what made Homer a great husband.

In the same episode, there is funny, almost moving, and completely beautiful dialogue during a sequence where Homer tells Marge how much he admires her because of the way she makes a peanut butter and jelly sandwich. What Homer lacks in smarts and in being articulate, he makes up for in his undying love and devotion to Marge, something that most couples are lucky to have these days, and unquestionably the staple of healthy marriages.

The show wasn't afraid to characterize the other problems common in America. The fighting between Bart and Lisa is something every family has, and something every family doesn't want their friends to know about. The favoritism Homer shows towards Bart is even more common, a trait readily found in fathers who don't know how to relate to their daughters, and thus make up for it by trying to be a better father to the ones they can communicate with.

Most important of all, these problems weren't OK. In the first 10 seasons of "The Simpsons," it wasn't OK for Homer to be a buffoon. It wasn't OK for Homer to stay out at Moe's for the whole night and neglect his family. It wasn't OK for him to ignore Lisa, even though that would be the easiest thing to do. Lisa would cry in her room. Marge would yell at Homer and put her foot down, and Homer would be ashamed of himself, for good reason. Why is Homer now incapable of being genuine?

In the last five seasons, the show has taken Homer's outrageous behavior to a new level while taking away his conscience. Homer is continually drunk, always ogling other women, and is a far cry from the sincere husband he was during the first 10 seasons. The worst part is that Marge doesn't care. Typically she sighs to herself, and says, "What can I do? [I am a woman!]" "The Simpsons" has conformed to the other obnoxious televisions dads like Ray Romano or The King of Queens instead of staying the course as a satire on the American family.

It almost seems like a ploy to maintain their standing as the most politically incorrect show along with South Park and Family Guy instead of keeping what works. Gone is the clever satire, the family values, the mocking of American culture and the hilarious episodes. All we have left of that family are the looks and character names, but not the substance that made them so great.

It truthfully makes me sad. I hate knowing that for the next few years, at 8:30 on Sunday nights, I will be completely and utterly disgusted.

Let's talk about sex ed

Amy Grzybinski

We're going to take a little journey in time. Think back, to your younger days, to your sex education classes. What do you remember? My memories are filled with the image of a bunch of fifth graders squirming uncomfortably as an ex-hippie told us to rub together our palms to simulate the sensation of sexual intercourse. I also remember the same fifth graders audibly protesting as we turned away in disgust from the woman giving birth in "The Miracle of Life."

But, beyond all the amusing anecdotes that come to mind, what do you remember being told, or being shown, about methods of birth control? What I remember is a glass box filled with the different types — an unrolled condom, an IUD, a diaphragm — and a very brief explanation of each. There were no demonstrations of proper use, or any information about where we could attain the devices ... just a brief explanation on how they worked. Seems inadequate, right? Well, what would you think if, in these sexual education programs, explanations about birth control were totally omitted from the curriculum?

Currently, the Bush administration and members of Congress are considering a grant of $50 million for abstinence-only sexual education programs to be taught in schools. This means that they will provide no information on different kinds of birth control, or even, heaven forbid, any demonstrations on proper use. As a first step, Bush is trying to push for a label to be put on all condom wrappers denoting that condoms "do not protect users from all sexually transmitted diseases," such as genital herpes. Perhaps they are doing this just to inform the public about the degree of protection provided by condoms, but I have a hunch that there's a deeper motivation behind the idea.

Of course, I fully respect the decision of an individual to abstain from sex until marriage if it is an issue they feel strongly about. And it is a fact that some young people today, upon being educated about abstinence, will choose this path. But that's no reason to completely omit the contraceptive talk from sex education. The idea here is having a choice. This country underwent a "sexual revolution," the purpose of which was to provide women with the option to have sex and the choice whether or not to become pregnant as a result. If you take away all the education that could be provided on the matter, then what you're basically doing is taking away a decision. What you're telling students is the opposite of the Nike campaign: Just Don't Do It.

Let's face facts here: most young people, especially those of our generation, are simply not going to stop having sex, no matter how many abstinence-only programs are shoved in their faces.

Let's face facts here: most young people, especially those of our generation, are simply not going to stop having sex, no matter how many abstinence-only education programs are shoved in their faces. What most likely will happen, with even less adequate information than we're provided with today, is more unsafe sex amongst young people. I mean, think about it, how many "responsible adults" do you know right now who engage in unprotected sex? Even after all the hours spent in a room full of bawdy seventh graders laughing hysterically when Jon asked the teacher what a wet dream was?

This issue shouldn't be about imposing a certain set of morals on kids.

That's what Sunday school is for. This isn't church we're talking about — it's sex. I think the better decision in this case would be to spend the proposed $50 million on complete and integrated sexual education programs for schools. That way, kids will be aware of all the options provided to them, and based on their personal beliefs, they'll be able to make an educated decision about what their sexual conduct will be.

Victims of victims

Yousef Munayyer

When hearing arguments about Israel, its existence, and Zionism in general, rarely is the Holocaust not mentioned. Rarely are pogroms not mentioned. In fact, these are frequent arguments for the necessity for a Jewish homeland. Zionists argue that the persecution of the Jewish people justifies the need for a Jewish nation.

There is some validity to this argument. Yet still the way in which this argument became policy, and then reality, is impossible for me to agree with. Certainly, persecution of Jews can be a valid argument for the creation of their own nation. However, it should not be at the expense of another nation.

I realized that what really annoys me about this argument is the sheer hypocrisy of it. Pogroms and the Holocaust were the calculated, xenophobic eliminations of people, millions of which were Jews. Then we called it genocide. Today, once "genocide" received a legal connotation in the arena of international law, we are more careful with using that term. Instead we substitute the rather whitewashed term "ethnic cleansing." However, there is yet more terminology in this regard. "Compulsory transfer" the predecessor to "ethnic cleansing" was on the tongues of many a Zionist even before the start of World War II.

There is a common misconception or myth, if you will, in the history of the conflict. Many believe, or are lead to believe, that Palestine was an uninhabited land before it was settle by Zionists. It's hard to imagine a greater falsity. The Holy Land has been one of the longest constantly inhabited lands in human history. No one ever got up and left. Even on the eve of the declaration of the state of Israel in 1948, the land that is today controlled by Israel did not contain a Jewish majority.

This was a major problem for many Zionist leaders of the time. They could not envision ever sharing a land they themselves did not feel welcome in. It is because of this that "compulsory transfer" came into the forefront of Zionist debate in the 1920s and 30s. The same evil had only years earlier decimated Armenians and Greeks in Turkey. A similar evil would only years later wipe out part of Europe's population.

On July 12, 1937, David Ben Gurion, who would soon become the first Prime Minister of Israel, wrote an entry into his diary. According to page 142 of "Righteous Victims," the entry read: "The compulsory transfer of the Arabs from the valleys of the proposed Jewish state could give us something which we never had, even when we stood on our own during the days of the first and second Temples ... We are given an opportunity which we never dared to dream of in our wildest imaginings. This is more than a state, government and sovereignty — this is national consolidation in a free homeland."

Imagine dreaming of gaining freedom at the expense of others. This became the reality of the Zionist dream. A land had to be cleared to make room for their dreams, creating nightmares for Palestinians since then.

Benny Morris, in his "Expulsion of the Palestinians," shows that on Dec. 20, 1940, Yosef Wietz, one of the forefathers of the transfer ideology wrote the following in his diary: "It must be clear that there is no room in the country for both peoples. There is no room here for compromises. There is no way but to transfer the Arabs from here to the neighboring countries, to transfer all of them, save perhaps for [the Palestinian Arabs of] Bethlehem, Nazareth, and the old Jerusalem. Not one village must be left, not one tribe. For this goal funds will be found. And only after this transfer will the country be able to absorb millions of our brothers and the Jewish problem will cease to exist. There is no other solution."

Reading these diaries is absolutely fascinating. That last sentence always gets me. I always wonder to myself to what extent was this fervent Zionist aware of the "final solution" that was taking place in Europe as he was jotting his thoughts into his diary. If he knew of the evils that resulted, would he still think the same way? I suppose we will never know.

Wietz, who was the caretaker of transfer policies entered the following into his diary on April 18, 1948: "I made a summery of a list of the [Palestinian] Arab villages which in my opinion must be cleared out in order to complete Jewish regions. I also made a summery of the places that have land disputes and must be settled by military means."

Think about the terminology: "cleared out" and "transfer." Is this how you describe human beings? Obviously not, but this is the attitude of Zionists at that time, and many still carry this attitude today. The fact that Israel was established as a safe haven for Jews using the same methods that they were fleeing shows that the Palestinians are victims of victims, a hypocrisy unrivaled.

This issue is one that people tend to shy away from, but it is the heart of the problem. As walls are being built and debates about transfers and bi-national statehood come to the forefront, the history of the removal of Palestinians becomes increasingly more important. The world turned away from the genocides of the war and then the transfer of Palestinians. It can't shut its eyes today as the result of this negligence that dominates the headlines of international media.

Gonchar and Jiri Slegr and the emergence of rookie goalie Andrew Raycroft.

And captain Joe Thornton, who suffered an upper body injury with two games left in the regular season, was ineffective — going without a point in the series despite playing all seven games.

For Kovalev, it was a successful turnaround from Game 4 when the Bruins won on Glen Murray's overtime goal. Kovalev held his hand after being hit on it at his own blue line, skated slowly into his own teammate, Sheldon Souray, and allowed Murray to skate in alone on Theodore.

Raycroft was sharp for most of Game 7, especially in the second period when the more aggressive Canadiens held a 15-9 shots advantage.

But the Bruins showed renewed spark in the third period, constantly attacking and then getting back to stop Montreal's rare threats.

Finally, Zednik scored after an outstanding play by Kovalev, who skated behind the Bruins net and shot from the goal line to Raycroft's right. The goalie stopped the puck but it bounced into the slot where the unguarded Zednik scored.

organization has been run since Bob Kraft took over a little more than a decade ago.

Belichick made no secret about his desire to reduce Law's cap number for next season. His contract will take up one-eighth of the team's salary.

Law retaliated by saying the Patriots' offer insulted him, and he thinks he deserves more money than he is already being paid.

Any leverage he and his agent had over New England's front office in these negotiations has now been lost.

Was he the best cornerback in the NFL last season? Definitely.

Were his three interceptions against the Colts a big factor in the AFC Championship victory? No question.

But there are very few certainties in the sports world. Peyton Manning's ability to single-handedly blow a crucial playoff football game is one of those certainties. Ty Law just reaped the benefits of having three floaters land in his arms.

Let's not forget about the last time Law signed a monumental contract. He had a career high nine interceptions in 1998 before signing a $50 million contract in 1999. Law then disappeared for two seasons comparably to the way Joe Thornton disappears every year in April when the playoffs begin.

This marriage should come to an end this week. Bob Kraft doesn't like punks working for him. What Law did Saturday morning was something you would expect from a member of the Portland Trailblazers, not the New England Patriots.

Belichick has proven that he can coach any group of players under any circumstances at any point in the season, and he teaches his players that no one is bigger than the team as a whole. Law apparently never received the message.

Send him to Buffalo with the other washed-up New England Patriots of old. Let him feed his family somewhere else.

Softball dominates Bonnies

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Despite sweeping St. Bonaventure in Sunday's doubleheader at home to extend their winning streak to 64 games at home and 15 overall, UMass softball coach Elaine Sortino remained disappointed.

"Today was awful. Awful," Sortino said. "We played awful, we were fortunate enough to win, and it was really a struggle. We were not a very good softball team today, so I really don't care about [the win streak]. We played awful; I'd rather play well.

"I was kind of disappointed, I can't lie. It was a struggle, but we won. I'd rather be ugly and win than be ugly and lose."

The Minutewomen (22-11, 6-0 Atlantic 10) received a big day out of junior infielder Hilary Puglia, whose no-out grand slam highlighted a five-runs batted in day against the Bonnies (8-18, 3-7 A-10).

"I thought Hilary was big, real big," Sortino said. "But we followed [the grand slam] up with runners on first and second with nobody out, and nothing to show for it, so you got to look at that too. I thought we should have done a better job following that grand slam up with no runners out, we should have gotten something more out of that."

The Maroon and White struck early in game one with the six-run second inning, to eventually mercy rule the Bonnies 8-0.

Pam Sulick opened up the second with a leadoff double into the right-center gap. She reached third after a wild pitch by Molly McCarthy. Things only turned worse for the sophomore pitcher, as she walked KC Budrewicz on the very next at bat and then hit freshman Amanda Morin to load up the bases with no outs.

In the next at bat, McCarthy hit Kristi Stefanoni on the first pitch to bring home Sulick, resulting in the first run of the day. McCarthy then hit Aisha Franke in following at bat to bring another run home in the form of Budrewicz.

After hitting three straight batters, McCarthy threw one down the middle to Hilary Puglia, who responded by crushing all of it high over the left-center fence to open the Minutewomen out to a 6-0 lead.

Denise Denis was walked, and KJ Kelley singled to left. After a Jamie Cahalan sacrifice bunt advanced runners to second and third.

Sulick cracked a line drive straight into the mitt of the third baseman in her second appearance of the inning, and Budrewicz went down looking to strand two runners.

McCarthy (3-9) was not pulled following the inning, and instead pitched a complete game, in which she allowed eight runs on eight hits.

The Minutewomen added another run in the fourth Sulick singled to left, and freshman Michea Holness, pinch-running for Kelley, took two and reached home safely.

After the Bonnies dropped a routine pop-fly in the sixth to send home Denis, giving the Minutewomen their eighth and deciding run.

Kelli Arnold (11-5) and Barbara LaFogg combined for the shutout.

The Bonnies were the first to strike, however, in Game 2. Jenna Busa led off the top of the first with two straight walks. After a fielder's choice that advanced the runners, Kim Dodson would slide in safely at home following a Kelley error that made it 1-0 in favor of St. Bonaventure.

Hilary Puglia got the run right back in the bottom of the first. After getting hit by a pitch, she stole home to tie it at one apiece.

End the Occupation! Bring them home now!

Rebels are defying the U.S. killing machine in Iraq – and despite the butchery by Marines in Falluja, their struggle for national liberation will continue. U.S. forces blasted through the city, bombing a mosque and shooting up residences, killing an estimated 600 people. Thousands more have been killed throughout the occupation, but the Iraqi people aren't the only ones paying the price:

- 680 U.S. troops have been killed in Iraq so far.
- Rumsfeld extended the year-long tour of duty of 20,000 troops.
- Bush said he'll send more.

This is the reality of the U.S. war on the Iraqi people. The lies to justify it have unraveled, one after another – and now more and more people are rejecting the price that the Bush administration wants us to pay. Join the Amherst branch of the ISO for a talk about why you should oppose this occupation and what to do about it, followed by an open discussion.

Bruins falter in final game

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — The Montreal Canadiens wrecked the playoffs for the Boston Bruins again, in the most stunning fashion ever in their storied rivalry.

Montreal	2
Boston	0

Richard Zednik scored midway through the third period and the Canadiens capped a comeback unprecedented in their rich history, beating the Bruins 2-0 last night to win the first-round series in seven games.

The Canadiens rallied from a 3-1 series deficit to win for the first time, capturing two of the final three games in Boston. Seventh-seeded Montreal will take on the Eastern Conference's top team, the Tampa Bay Lightning, in the second round.

Boston, which had never lost a series it led 3-1, also had its six-game winning streak in Game 7s snapped. Montreal has won four of the six Game 7s between the Original Six teams.

Zednik clinched this victory with an empty-net goal with 7.8 seconds remaining. Alex Kovalev, the NHL playoffs goal leader with five, and Saku Koivu assisted on both.

The Canadiens were 0-12 in seven-game series they trailed 3-1. They had gotten as close as 3-3 just one other time, in 1934.

The Bruins were 17-0 when ahead 3-1 but were eliminated with the same shock that ended their 2002 season. Seeded first then, they fell to eighth-seeded Montreal in six games in the first round as goalie Jose Theodore played brilliantly.

Theodore was outstanding again Monday, stopping 32 shots, including 12 in the third period.

The second-seeded Bruins fell short despite the midseason acquisitions of veterans Michael Nylander, Sergei

Ty tries to be above the 'Law'

His name is just way too ironic to pass this one up. Ty fought the law, and the law won. For the second time in four years, New England Patriots cornerback Ty Law has been arrested for a boneheaded, Grady Little-like move.

Law was driving his 2004 Rolls Royce on the main strip in the South Beach section of Miami when a police officer tried pulling him over for an alleged lane violation. Law pulled over at first but drove away before pulling over a second time.

Jeff Howe

As if one chase with the police wasn't enough, Law decided to flee on foot when he was about to be handcuffed. When he was caught, he warned the two officers on the scene not to touch him because of his status as a professional athlete.

Law was charged with two misdemeanors, failure to obey a police officer and resisting an officer.

In December of 2000, Law made his first splash in the police log headlines when he was arrested at the Canadian border in New York for possession of the drug Ecstasy.

Good job, Ty. That is the perfect way to keep a positive image of yourself when an entire region already thinks you are a self-absorbed, money-hungry, me-before-the-team kind of guy.

It was also a very convenient time for him to pull such a move with the NFL Draft coming up this weekend. With contract talks between the Pro Bowl cornerback and the Patriots stalling, there is no question that coach Bill Belichick has been shopping Law around for extra draft picks.

The Patriots already have an arsenal of assets they can use to trade up and improve their position with two first round picks, so a package deal to get rid of Law would increase their stock.

With Monday's acquisition of Corey Dillon, the Patriots won't need to address their need for a running back in the first round of the draft. Ideally, the Pats could set up a trade to move up in order to draft Miami safety Sean Taylor.

If this works out, Taylor can replace Eugene Wilson at safety, and Wilson can move back to his natural position at cornerback.

If that fails, this is a very deep draft for defensive backs, so the Super Bowl champs will be able to draft a solid cornerback in the first or second round.

Obviously, they cannot replace Ty Law's talent or physical presence on the field right away, but a 30-year-old cornerback who has been notoriously injury prone over the past few years is a liability.

His antics since the Super Bowl have been annoying and detrimental to the classy way this

Lacrosse falls in OT

NEW HAVEN, Conn. – Friday's release of "Kill Bill, Vol. 2" centers around the bloody interactions between former members of the "Deadly Viper Assassination Squad," a group of assassins who all carry snake-derived code-names, such as "Black Mamba" for Uma Thurman's main character.

Yale	9
UMass	8

Fitting, then, that on Saturday the Massachusetts lacrosse team was indeed snakebit by a play the Yale Bulldogs like to call "viper."

After a back-and-forth game that saw the two teams go on a handful of goal-scoring streaks to swap leads, the Bulldogs pulled out a 9-8 victory in the second overtime.

Ned Britt streaked in from the substitution line with 1:38 left in the second overtime session, with a Minuteman defender in tow, and took a feed from Dan Brillman, stationed behind the net. Britt quickly fired it past UMass goaltender Bill Schell, ending the Bulldog's five-game losing streak, and snapping the Minutemen's four-game run of victories.

UMass fell to 6-5 on the season, and the Bulldogs improved to an even 5-5.

Yale coach Andy Shay, a former assistant at UMass, said that when an obvious advantage comes off a substitution, the codeword is "viper," alerting the ball handler to the possibility of a quick goal.

"We're trying to make sure we've got full offense on the field, they're trying to make sure they've got the full defense on the field," Shay said. "It's a tough way to lose. It was luck. [UMass is] great, they know what they're doing, to get any daylight like that, it was luck."

The Bulldogs led late in regulation, after firing off four straight goals to overcome a 7-4 deficit. But Neil Lundburg played the pivot man 20 feet in front of freshman Jordan Ellis's net, firing a bounce shot that hit the top corner to tie the game at eight with just 53 seconds to go.

Ellis was the biggest story of the first overtime, making two excellent stops just seconds apart. The Minutemen swarmed Ellis's net with 2:49 to go in the first extra session, and the freshman stopped both Kevin Glenz's diving shot and Matt Tundo's rebound attempt. Ellis made a total of 15 saves on the day.

The Minutemen, who went on a five-goal run from 1:55 of the second quarter until the Bulldogs scored at 9:04 of the third, looked sluggish during the fourth quarter, until Lundburg's extra-man goal rejuvenated the squad. The goal was set up by a costly too-many-men penalty taken by Yale, after a confusing exchange on the field.

"I actually did that," Shay said. "We thought we were light, we thought we only had nine [players], and I just sent a defenseman on. That's one of those things that deflates your bubble a little bit. We're man down, and they score, and it was pretty scary."

For the Bulldogs, the victory snaps a long losing streak, which stretches back to March 28, Yale currently sits at the bottom of the Ivy League standings, with a 1-3 conference record.

"When we talked about it, this win means more about just winning a game than it does just beating Umass" Shay said. "If we hadn't been on a five-game skid, maybe there would be more pressure. We just wanted to win at this point, didn't matter who it was."

It was a pseudo-homecoming for Shay, his first game as the Yale coach against his former employer of four years. In that time, Shay helped the Minutemen to two Eastern College Athletic Conference titles and two NCAA tournament appearances.

"It's tough. I don't want to see these kids lose," Shay said of the Minutemen. "I wouldn't say it's quite bittersweet, but it's about as close to that as you can get. These are all still my boys, kids I've recruited, they're my guys. I don't ever want to see them lose. The alums here, they say, 'I hope you go 13-1,' and I say the same thing about them, so it's tough." -

Owls outlast UMass

Kerri Connerty had two goals and an assist in the Minutewomen's 20-14 loss to Temple on Sunday. UMass travels to Philadelphia on Friday to take on St. Joseph's starting at 5 p.m.

After a 1-6 start, the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team battled into a position to overtake Duquesne as the fourth and qualifying team for the Atlantic 10 Championships with a win against Temple (7-6, 4-1 A-10) on Sunday.

Temple	20
UMass	14

But an eight-point performance from senior captain Tracey Drown wasn't enough to lift UMass (3-9, 1-3 A-10) over the defending conference champions in a 20-14 shootout at Garber Field.

The Owls jumped out to a 4-0 lead and never looked back as they maintained a three-goal buffer throughout the game. Corey Leader led Temple with four goals and four assists on the day, while fellow sophomore Nicole Cataldo contributed with a game-high seven goals.

UMass got on the board when Drown netted back-to-back goals on an unassisted and free position tally to begin a short-lived Massachusetts run.

In a game of streaks, Temple responded by scoring five consecutive goals in just over two minutes, to make it a 9-3 Temple advantage with 13:37 left in the half.

Hope Zelinger stopped the bleeding with a goal at 12:18, off a pass from UMass senior defender Andrea Valachovic, who picked up her first point of the season with the assist. Three minutes later, Drown scooped up the fifth and final UMass ground ball and sprinted down the field, weaving through the defense on path to scoring the third of her six goals.

"[Drown] had a great game, you can't ask anything more from her," UMass coach Carrie Bolduc said. "She came in and gave it 100 percent and never gave up, and has become someone we can really rely on."

While Drown's play ignited a 4-0 Massachusetts run to end the half, it also signaled the start of a 16-0 advantage in ground balls that Temple maintained throughout the second half. The UMass barrage saw junior Maura McGarrity put two shots past Megan McLouth of Temple to narrow the gap to 12-8 at the break.

The game stabilized to begin the second frame, as Temple scored twice, and UMass scored three times. But even play was not in the script, as Temple broke the game open for good when they reeled off five straight tallies to reach a 19-11 advantage that proved insurmountable.

Drown scored three more goals to end the game, two on free-position shots and one on an unassisted dodge, but that was all the Minutewomen could muster as the final whistle sounded with the score standing at 20-14.

The teams last met during last year's A-10 Championships, in a game that saw the Owls capture the conference title 15-9. The grudge match soon turned ugly, as both teams logged nine minutes of penalty time off three yellow cards.

"Temple and [UMass] play a physical game, so the penalties are not surprising based on who we are and where we play," Bolduc said. "Southern teams tend to play a more physical game and New England officials tend to call a safer game."

The Owls out-shot the Minutewomen 38-17, but Amherst native Remy Bacaicoa kept the score close with 14 saves between the pipes for UMass in her third start of the season.

The loss drops Massachusetts from fifth to seventh in the A-10 with three games remaining, while boosting Temple into a tie for first. Victories over St Joseph's 1-2 (A-10) and LaSalle 0-4 (A-10) this weekend could be enough to propel UMass into the A-10 tournament, depending on other conference action.

"We know that we have to keep fighting because we're still in this thing," Bolduc said.

Students join fight against unemployment surge

By Cory O'Brien
Collegian Correspondent

AMHERST — Labor organizers are asking University of Massachusetts students to join the election fight against President Bush to combat a sharp rise in long term unemployment in an unlikely audience: college graduates.

Union organizers say that the tripling in three years of long-term unemployment for college grads testifies to the bankrupticy of economic policy of the Bush administration that impels students to elect a new president, if they are to assure themselves jobs for the future.

Long-term unemployment is described by the Economic Policy Institute as being out of work and seeking a job for more than six months. The condition often results in extreme financial and health care hardships and the loss of unemployment benefits.

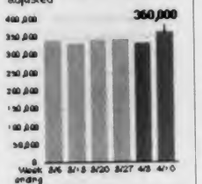
Often used as a benchmark of job availability, long term unemployment is at its highest since the Reagan administration, making up 23 percent of the total unemployed — over two million people in all — according to the Department of Labor. Those with college degrees have been hit the hardest, with long-term unemployment up 299 percent since 2000 for the college educated, according to the Economic Policy Institute, a nonpartisan think-tank with union backing.

Between 2000 and 2003, the number of college graduates who are listed as unemployed for more than six months has grown from 92,418 to 369,115, the institute states.

Labor activists blame President Bush for allowing these high-skilled jobs, as well as blue collar jobs, to be shipped overseas in order to maximize profits for American business. In response, the AFL-CIO, the federation of over 70 different American unions, has launched an aggressive campaign supporting Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) for president.

"Getting Bush out of office is key," said UMass student and union organizer Jon Lentz. "Kerry's policies and voting record are just much more worker friendly."

As part of its campaign, the AFL-CIO has announced that its Union Summer program will offer internships to college juniors to gain field experience with unions, focusing on getting out the vote for Kerry in the major swing states. The move, a bit of a departure for Union Summer, which usually focuses on specific union issues, underscores union determination to beat President Bush in November, according to the AFL-CIO website, www.aflcio.org.



Union Summer is also intended to mobilize college students in union activities. Brian Oelberg, a recruiter for Union Summer on a two-week recruiting tour at UMass, said that one

Member of Schindler's list relives horrors of Holocaust

By Gabriel Dye
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — "One day [in 1942], the Germans rounded up 100 of us, threw us into trucks, and delivered us to a factory outside of Krakow," said Sol Urbach, a Holocaust survivor, on Monday, marking the First Annual Holocaust Remembrance Program in Johnson Chapel at Amherst College. Urbach never saw his family again.

Urbach, worked in the factory depicted in the 1993 film "Schindler's List." He was a member of the original list of 1,200 Polish Jews drawn up by Oskar Schindler, a member of the Nazi party, to protect them from Nazi concentration camps.

Addressing a crowd of roughly 70 people, Urbach spoke of his experiences during the Holocaust.

The factory belonged to Oskar Schindler, who upon seeing 15-year-old Urbach and another boy of the same age, shouted, "I don't want children." The SS guards refused to take the boys back.

"And that is how I came to be a Schindlerjuden (Schindler Jew) through the war years, and I suppose forever," he said.

Urbach worked in the factory making pots and pans during the day, and slept in the Krakow ghetto at night. On March 12, 1943, Schindler urged his workers to remain at the factory overnight. The entire Krakow ghetto was to be liquidated.

Over the next three days, Schindler reported brutal killings as the ghetto's inhabitants were massacred.

"My whole family was there, father, mother, three brothers and two sisters."

Those who survived were moved to the forced-labor camp of Plaszow, just outside of Krakow. The workers of Schindler's factory continued to travel to the factory every day.

When an order came out of Berlin that forbade Jewish employees from working in factories, Schindler decided to protect his workers and build his own concentration camp adjoining his factory. With his persuasion and powerful friends, Schindler built a subdivision camp in Plaszow.

A law requiring all camps to hold a minimum of 1,000 people allowed Schindler, who at this time was convinced he needed to save as many as possible from Nazi destruction, to protect many more. By the spring of 1944, Plaszow and other camps had orders to shut down. In fear that his workers would be murdered, Schindler used his friends in the German hierarchy to relocate his factory into Czechoslovakia. He convinced them that he would produce armaments for the war.

On the way to the new factory some of the rail-

UMass to prevent slip in minority applicant numbers with $300,000 recruitment efforts

ANGELA P. LINCOLN/COLLEGIAN

Michael Gargano, vice chancellor of student affairs and activites, credits recruitment efforts with raising UMass minority applicant numbers.

AMHERST, (AP) — University of Massachusetts-Amherst officials predict there will be no drop in minority enrollment, largely because of a $300,000 increase in its admissions office budget to send recruiters to more high schools across the country.

Michael Gargano Jr., vice chancellor for student affairs, said that because of increased national recruiting and more applications reviewers, about the same number of black students and American Indian students applied to the university's flagship campus this year as last, and the number of Hispanic applicants was up 20 percent.

The step-up in recruiting and other measures were taken a year after the U.S. Supreme Court struck down the minority admissions system UMass and other schools around the country used to give minority applicants a boost in the admissions process.

"Basically, the Supreme Court said, 'We don't care how much [diversity] costs. If you care about it, find a way to do it'," Julie Peterson, a spokeswoman for the University of Michigan, the defendant in the Supreme Court, told The Boston Globe in an interview published on Tuesday.

Michigan spokeswoman said last week that it was too early to predict the diversity of the school's incoming class, although Michigan increased spending on admissions and recruiting by $1.8 million.

About 18,000 students applied to UMass-Amherst, roughly 10 percent more than last year, and 14,000 were accepted. The school hopes to enroll 4,200 freshmen, of whom about 700 are minority students.

"I would consider it a success," Gargano said of the expanded admissions program. "We were confident of our strategies, but you never know until you get the applications."

Until last year, UMass-Amherst was one of several schools nationwide that used a numerical advantage based on race. Applicant groups receiving points included veterans, poor students and those who showed leadership qualities. Minorities were granted an extra half-point out of possible 10 points.

The Supreme Court ruled last June that while minority admissions preferences were legal, the race-based point system was not.

Boston College purchases bishop's $99.4M mansion

The Archdiocese of Boston announced the sale of the Boston mansion in which former archbishop Bernard Cardinal Law lived with 43 adjoining acres.

By Jay Lindsay
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Boston College will buy the lavish archbishop's mansion and 43 adjoining acres from the Archdiocese of Boston for $99.4 million in a deal that gives the boxed-in school expansion space while providing the church with much-needed cash.

Proceeds from the sale, announced Tuesday by church and school officials, will be used to pay a $90 million settlement reached last year with more than 550 victims of clergy sex abuse.

BC also reached an agreement with the church to acquire another nearby parcel in two years for $8 million, which will also go toward settling abuse claims.

"It puts us on the road to recovery by allowing the church to pay down debt," said Archbishop Sean P. O'Malley.

"I don't think we had any options," said O'Malley, who has said the archdiocese is $135 million in debt. "In that sense, at least in my mind, it was not a terribly difficult decision. The sense of loss, in terms of our history here, is certainly very great."

The stately, three-story Italian Renaissance-style mansion in the city's Brighton section served as the residence for the past four archbishops. But O'Malley, a Capuchin Franciscan friar who has taken a vow of poverty, opted to live in an apartment behind the Cathedral of the Holy Cross in Boston's South End.

Built in the 1920s, the mansion served notice to the Yankee establishment that impoverished Catholic immigrants had become a religious and political force. But in recent years, as revela-

Supreme Court hears first case in Bush's anti-terror policies

By Anne Gearan
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — The government can't throw out prisoners' constitutional rights to make their case in court just because the country faces new threats in the war on terrorism, a lawyer for foreign-born detainees argued Tuesday in the Supreme Court's first case arising from the Sept. 11 attacks.

"It's been plain for 215 years," lawyer John Gibbons argued. The government, he said, cannot create a "lawless enclave" where no court, American or otherwise, can check up on things.

"The United States is at war," responded Theodore Olson, the Bush administration's top Supreme Court lawyer.

Foreigners held at the Navy's prison camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, want the Supreme Court to give them a legal right "that is not authorized by Congress, does not arise from the Constitution, has never been exercised by this court," said Olson, himself a symbol of the cost of terrorism.

Olson's wife, Barbara, was killed aboard the jet that slammed into the Pentagon in September 2001. She called him on her cell phone minutes before the crash, and reported the plane had been hijacked.

The justices seemed deeply divided over the fate of more than 600 men from 44 countries who have been held for more than two years at the Guantanamo camp, and about the underlying questions concerning presidential powers in wartime.

"I'm still honestly most worried about the fact that there would be a large category of unchecked and uncheckable actions dealing with the detention of individuals that are being held in a place where America has the power to do everything," said Justice Stephen Breyer.

Two and a half years after Sept. 11, the high court is starting small, with a simple question about whether federal judges can even hear the complaints of the Guantanamo prisoners.

Next week, the court takes up two related cases that may hit closer to home for many Americans. Those cases test President Bush's power to detain U.S. citizens for long periods without charges, and with virtually no access to the outside world.

The terrorism cases before the Supreme Court this year will draw some boundaries for White House and military authority in a war without defined opponents or a clear end.

Proceeds from sale to pay $90M settlement

tions spread of widespread priest sex abuse and the failure of church leaders to stop it, the hilltop mansion became a symbol to some of opulence, arrogance and a growing chasm between church hierarchy and the laity.

BC spokesman Jack Dunn said school officials had not decided what to do with the archbishop's residence, but said it may be used for administrative offices. In addition to living quarters, the mansion also houses offices and meeting rooms, and is used to broadcast Boston Catholic Television's daily Mass.

The school will use the land for athletic fields and recreation, said Dunn, adding that there are no "imminent plans" for development.

The sale of the property is part of O'Malley's pledge not to use Mass collection money or the sale of parishes or schools to pay for the settlement, still the largest known deal between a U.S. diocese and victims of clergy sex abuse.

"It was very important for us as an archdiocese to clearly show how the funds for the settlement were raised," O'Malley said.

Boston College, a Jesuit university located across the street from the archdiocese's headquarters, immediately expressed interest when the property became available late last year. But from the start, the church emphasized that BC would have no advantage over any other bidder.

"(There was) no sweetheart deal, no clergy discount today," said the Rev. William Leahy, Boston College's president. "This is a significant price, no question. Our advisers felt it was a very fair price."

Prisoner's family lost in tragedy road cars being used to transport the workers, including one containing Urbach, were mistakenly redirected to Gross-Rosen, a concentration camp housing gas chambers.

"We were there seven days," said Urbach. "Then Schindler did the impossible."

A guard called out the names of about 1,000 people, who were then shipped to the factory in Czechoslovakia, which is depicted in the film "Schindler's List."

In the 10 months until the end of the war, the factory produced nothing. The inexperienced workers had no skills in the feigned manufacturing of the supposed product, parts for V2 bombs.

Schindler would go to the railroad station, take off the original shipping labels on transports, and put on his own label, said Urbach. Schindler would avoid trouble with the local Nazi authorities with bribes of carts full of whiskey and chocolate.

In preparation for any Nazis that may have come to the factory, Schindler left 30 revolvers in his office. He instructed those with any knowledge of guns to arm themselves. Urbach, with a group of 17 people, grabbed injured war horses roaming about and spent the next 14 days riding back to Poland.

Upon returning, "no one was waiting with open arms," Urbach said. He then discovered that none of his family had survived. " The most tragic moment was when I discovered that all my family had been killed. Having recently retired from his construction business, Urbach now visits colleges and civic groups to discuss his experiences and the film "Schindler's List."

Urbach, who worries about the rise of anti-Semitism in Europe today, said, "You've got to able to get along with all races and nationalities. I just hope something like this never happens again."

of the goals of the program was to allow college students to gain experience in union activism. He said that it's important for college students to get involved with unions because "most of us are workers at one point or another."

Despite the effort to oust Bush, many union organizers have expressed reservations about putting so much labor faith in elections. Oelberg noted that labor's two candidates, Gov. Howard Dean and Rep. Richard Gephardt, are both out of the race.

According to Sarah James, family issues advocate for the UMass graduate student union Graduate Employment Organization, too much energy is going into the presidential elections.

James said that she "has a lot of problems with unions endorsing democrats because they don't hold candidates accountable. It's easy to say that they are better than Bush and then support them, and I do think that it's important that Bush not be elected again, but there needs to be more components. I can't say I really support a get out and vote campaign. There needs to be more than that."

The outsourcing of jobs is the biggest issue facing working people in the upcoming election, according to both Lentz and James. Since the Bush administration took office, over 2 million American jobs have been lost, according to The New York Times. Lentz blames Bush's close ties to many multinational corporations for the jobs lost.

"Bush is very pro-corporation, and corporations are always looking for ways to maximize profit," Lentz said. "They do this by outsourcing jobs to places like Mexico, where wages and worker standards are lower." Lentz stated that even a Democratic president may not be able to stop this practice, and that the only way to fight outsourcing and poor labor standards in developing nations is to have "unions waiting for (the corporations) wherever they go."

James said that the best way for students to ensure their rights in the workplace after graduation is to work for unions while still in college.

"It's important for the labor movement to reach students, and important for students to work with the labor movement because they could become a member of a union, and they need to know about the process," James said, "Students need to know what they can do to protect their rights as workers."

James also called for a worldwide union to combat globalization. Only labor solidarity for all working people, not just the American working class, will raise the working standards for everyone, she said.

"Imagine the strength of labor movements in all countries, if they get together and say, 'If you don't raise labor standards, the whole world is going to strike'," James said.

Regardless of whether union activists genuinely want Kerry as president, or if they just believe that anyone is better than Bush, they're launching a full-scale attack aimed at the November election to shape the debate around working class issues.

"A union's best defense against corporate power is still the ability to deliver votes," Lentz said.

More attention given to admissions process

The University of Massachusetts has experienced several controversies over minority-related issues this year. Whether it is the sight of a Graduate Employment Organization hunger strike against the International Student Fee, the heated debates between the Student Government Association and ALANA over caucus seats in the student senate, or the elimination of the racially based point system for minority admissions this year, officials of the University of Massachusetts admissions office are predicting that minority enrollment numbers will not fall.

In fact, in some cases, minority enrollment for UMass is growing.

According to the Boston Globe, Hispanic applicant numbers rose by 20 percent, and black and American Indian applicant numbers remained stable. Last June, the Supreme Court ruled that the University of Michigan's policy of admitted minorities by a race-based point system was unconstitutional, forcing UMass to eliminate its use of a similar system. While the decision may have shaken the base of the admissions office tree, it may have come as a blessing in disguise.

The ruling forced UMass officials to reexamine the process by which they accept students. After some revamping, it appears that they have emerged with a plan to improve the quality of the school.

Michael Gargano, vice chancellor of student affairs, is now working to bolster minority student applications. A $300,000 bonus has been added to the admissions office budget in order to extend the recruitment radius that admissions can pursue. Gargano said at a faculty senate meeting last March that recruiters will be focusing their search for applicants in areas such as New York state, Washington D.C., and the south, such as Georgia.

By working to attract people from different areas of the nation, the University will benefit not only by the wide variety of opinions and cultural backgrounds, but by strengthening the name and reputation of the flagship school. Hopefully this heightened popularity will attract the attention of state legislators, making them realize that the University deserves better funding.

UMass has endured debilitating budget cuts and program losses. The University remains understaffed, overcrowded, and outdated. Students struggle to gain entrance to classes required for their major, and residence hall lounges are converted into three-person dorm rooms. However, with Gargano's push to renew the energy of the admissions process, UMass is slowly working to solving these problems. As the standards of admitted students improve, so will the value of the UMass degree, and the quality of the education it provides.

By raising the numbers of admitted students, the University will also attract more money for new buildings, technology, and hiring more faculty.

The price of the new admissions drive is not cheap. The cost of recruiting will inevitably rise, and help from the state can never be counted on. This may require UMass to dip into its own budget, which will affect the University.

However, admissions is one area that the University cannot afford to ignore. Although the initial investment may seem steep, the quality of education, diversity, and minority programs will benefit the school in years to come.

No corruption for oil in Iraq

Ben Duffy

Just the other day, a friend remarked to me, "If we went to war in Iraq for oil, why is the price of gas so high?" I chuckled at that one.

Yeah, seriously...nearly two dollars a gallon and rising. And some people are still running around with these ridiculous "no blood for oil" stickers on their cars?

Yes, Iraq and the oil trade are inseparable. Saddam built his 55 majestic palaces on oil money. Saddam's system was pretty simple. Iraq's oil supply belonged to "the people," meaning that it belonged to the government, meaning that it belonged to Saddam. Since the invasion of Iraq, there's been a change in policy. Now the oil belongs to the people, meaning that the profits raised from it will be put toward schools, hospitals, and other such institutions that Saddam felt were secondary to his constant palace building.

Well, that doesn't make sense though, does it? Iraq was crippled by trade sanctions throughout the 1990s, so just where did Saddam get his money? As it turns out, Saddam never got out of the oil business. Besides the vastly underpublicized desert pipeline that we found pumping oil to Syria, Iraq continued selling oil under the cover of the systematically corrupt U.N. Oil for Food Program. The United Nations doesn't even deny that the program was fraught with cheating, and Kofi Annan has agreed to appoint an investigative panel to get to the bottom of the matter.

I once read an article about the devious little plan that Saddam crafted to get around the Oil For Food Program. It wasn't rocket science — he just resold the food he received to neighboring countries, and stuck the profits into his pocket. Packages of food clearly marked "not for resale" have been found on the shelves of grocery stores throughout the Middle East. The Iraqi people still went hungry, and the only people who benefited were Saddam and his European trading partners.

But there's a new twist to the story that I suspect will go largely underreported in the liberal media. Fraud at Haliburton was a huge story, but this one will probably not see the light of day. Investigators, led by Claude Hankes-Drielsma and the KPMG accounting firm have found solid documentary evidence of oil kickbacks secretly conducted under the Oil For Food Program. Saddam didn't pay off his buddies in Europe with cash. He paid them off with barrels of crude oil.

Mr. Hankes-Drielsma has said "based on the facts as I know them at the present time, the United Nations failed in its responsibility to the Iraqi people and the international community at large." He has since uncovered 270 recipients of oil kickbacks, and he estimates that one out of every six barrels of oil leaving Iraq was a gift to political allies. Not surprisingly, there seems to be a disproportionate number of Frenchmen on the list, including 12 million barrels to Charles Pasqua (former Interior Minister of France) and eight million barrels to Jean-Bernard Merimee (former French Ambassador to the United Nations).

Fundamentally, I would have to agree with the bumper sticker 'no blood for oil.' I just find it ironic that it usually appears right next to other stickers that say 'no war' or 'impeach Bush.'

The most interesting name on the list is the recipient of 72.2 million barrels: Patrick Maugein, European oil baron and close confidante of Monsieur Jacques Chirac. No, the prime minister of France doesn't not appear on the list, but the investigators have already aired their suspicions that Maugein was nothing but a go-between for Saddam and Chirac.

Lebanese-French middleman Elias Firzli, recipient of 14.6 million barrels of oil, admitted in an interview with Insight magazine that the Iraqis desperately sought an audience with Chirac prior to the war, and were willing to buy the attention of the prime minister if necessary. Firzli went on to say that he introduced Iraqi envoy Nizar Hamdoon to senior French officials in Paris.

The United Nations refused to back this war, due in large part to the veto-wielding French component of the Security Council. That much is historical fact. But if you think that the French were motivated by anything other than money, you need to pull your head out of your rear end. The French were quite content with the status quo, because Saddam was making some very powerful Frenchmen very rich.

Fundamentally, I would have to agree with the bumper sticker "no blood for oil." I just find it ironic that it usually appears right next to other stickers that say "no war" or "impeach Bush." Apparently these people are confused as to just whose blood was being shed, and who was buying the oil. Hundreds of thousands of people died at the hands of Saddam's brutal regime, and he managed to keep the United Nations off his back for years by buying off one of its permanent Security Council members. Keep that in the mind next time you see a sticker that says "no blood for oil."

Do as the Romans do

Marisa Kanof and Adam DeSimone

Who's hungry? We're not. Why? Because we're not protesting a fee placed on international students. Let's take a moment to examine the motives underlying this "hunger strike."

From what we understand, the students refusing to eat for 48 hours feel discriminated against by the University of Massachusetts administration because of The New International Student Fee. The administration has levied international students with a $65 fee in an effort to fund the federally mandated Student Exchange Visitor Information System program; a program which was put in place after the Patriot Act was passed by members of a legislative body that were elected by the people into their respective positions of power. Personally, we feel the protest is ridiculous and more than that, that the fee is acceptable — if not necessary. Below is our reasoning for what will no doubt be considered a controversial position on this issue.

For starters, if the students have a problem with the new fee, they need to be protesting on the mall of Washington not the ramp of Whitmore. It's not like UMass maliciously imposed this fee on students in an effort to scam more money out of them. The SEVIS program had to be put in place and we feel it is perfectly fair to ask students to pay a fee to fund it. Furthermore the required fee gives a whopping $8 to Uncle Sam. The remaining money is used to counter balance the budget cuts and to fund the International Persons Office. Would it be fair to charge all UMass students for a service they don't use? All students have had to pay increased fees as a result of the budget cuts, not just international students.

Secondly, we don't feel it is "persecution" to make international students register with the federal government. The government has every right to know who is entering the country and why. That is why international students are issued visas if they want to come here. Furthermore, perhaps if the government had kept better tabs on who was in the country and why, the catastrophic events of 9/11 could have been prevented. If one is not a terrorist, and none of the individuals on the UMass campus are, then one should not worry about the government keeping tabs on who is coming in and out of the country. Whether we like it or not, everyone's civil liberties have been called into question since 9/11, not just those of international students.

If one is not a terrorist, and none of the individuals on the UMass campus are, then one should not worry about the government keeping tabs on who is coming in and out of the country.

One of us will be traveling abroad next semester to the United Kingdom and will have to pay a similar fee for being an international student. The only difference is that it is a $500 fee, not a $65 one. Upon arriving in the United Kingdom, is the author of this submission going to complain? No. Is the author going to protest? Certainly not. The author somehow doubts he would be taken seriously if he stood outside Buckingham Palace and whined about paying an entrance fee to live in and use another country's resources for six months while furthering his education — especially when he volunteered to do it.

The international students say that they help the campus succeed because they teach here, provide for diversity and pay out-of-state tuition and fees. Apparently only international students help the campus this way. The other one of us being from Arizona (yes, that is South of the Mason-Dixon line AND East of the Mississippi!) would know nothing about paying out of state tuition and fees or providing this campus with a sense of diversity.

Finally, traveling abroad is expensive. Between out of state tuition and fees, airline tickets, shipping one's stuff to and from campus or their newfound place of residence and the overall expense of living in a different country, we find it hard to believe that a $65 fee presents that much of a problem financially for the students refusing to pay the fee. If the students have the support of the rest of campus (as they claim to) perhaps it would be more effective to put out a jar for donations to help students pay the fee instead of staging a 48-hour hunger strike. Furthermore, we do not see how this makes a statement seeing as how the average person with a bad stomach bug goes for 48 hours without eating. While we understand that the fee is an annoyance, we would like to remind those protesting that the same fee at other universities is sometimes as much as 10 times the amount that UMass is charging.

The bottom line is that if any students refuse to pay the fee and get kicked out of UMass, it is their own fault and they will have to suffer the consequences accordingly. While their hearts might be in the right place, their actions aren't. The international students should have been aware of the laws of the United States before electing to come here. If the students were going to have a problem with the Patriot Act and the ensuing SEVIS system, perhaps they should have stayed in their home country. We are not trying to discourage exchange between our country and others, only pointing out that when one is in someone else's country, they should be prepared to follow the laws and customs of that country. As the saying goes, when in Rome, do as the Romans do.

Marisa Kanof and Adam DeSimone are UMass students.

March for women's lives

Rachel Smith

This Sunday, thousands of women are storming our nation's capital, demonstrating a fierce commitment to women's health and reproductive choice, and the timing couldn't be better.

The National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League, or NARAL, is coordinating the March for Women's Lives this weekend in Washington, D.C. and I'm proud to report that I'll be there, demonstrating my right to choose what I want to do with my body.

Look, I know you've read all the rhetoric about Roe v. Wade being challenged and a woman's reproductive rights being in no greater danger than it is today. I also know that messages like that are usually followed by a request for a $35 donation, so, like me, you probably don't take it too seriously.

Unfortunately, women's choices are being threatened and Roe v. Wade is in danger of being overturned. This isn't to say that the Supreme Court is going to outlaw abortion tomorrow, or even next year, but state by state women's reproductive rights are being severely limited.

As you read this, state legislatures around the country are banning abortion procedures — unnecessarily and unconstitutionally jeopardizing women's health and well being.

You may have read about the republican Congress stacking federal courts with ultra-conservative judges. For example, judge Charles Pickering has openly supported a federal constitutional amendment banning abortions, according to CNN. With people like Judge Pickering in federal courts, you can imagine what will happen when women in conservative states challenge abortion bans in the courts.

Conservatives and republicans are positioning themselves to wage all-out war on reproductive rights, especially if George Bush is re-elected in November. Remember, Chief Supreme Court Justice William H. Rehnquist and Associate Justice Sandra Day O'Connor have indicated that they'll most likely retire within the next few years. Although Rehnquist is conservative, O'Connor is a moderate and is often the swing vote on divisive cases, like the right to choice.

Bush is probably itching to stack the Supreme Court with right-wing judges who would make Justice Antonin Scalia look like Jane Fonda. With a Republican Congress that's unlikely to get a Democratic majority any time soon, there would be nothing stopping Bush from appointing whoever he wants to the country's highest court.

The March for Women's Lives isn't just about the abortion debate; it's a chance for women around the country to show their legislators that we understand what's going on, we vote and we won't elect people into office who don't care about us.

Many women participating in the march aren't thrilled about abortions; the decision to have a child is a difficult one, and abortions are an invasive procedure. I don't think anybody is thrilled about the idea of women who have no choice but to terminate a pregnancy. However, all participants this weekend are unified around the principle that women and women alone are capable of making our own medical decisions, regardless of personal opinions and personal choices.

After all, women's health and women's rights are about more than Roe v. Wade. For example, Attorney General John Ashcroft recently subpoenaed hundreds of women's medical records for a lawsuit brought by a group of physicians opposed to the recent federal ban on late-term abortions, that was passed without an exception clause for the mother's health.

This latest intimidation tactic by the White House has less to do with reproductive rights and everything to do with women's right to privacy. I wonder how Ashcroft would feel if House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi subpoenaed the Attorney General's latest prostate exam.

There are plenty of other things to get angry about. What's up with most HMO's not covering birth control but paying for erectile dysfunction treatments such as Viagra? That is, among women who can afford their own insurance. According to the Center for Disease Control, the number of women covered by private insurance decreased by nearly 5 percent between 1998 and 2001.

Although there's a whole laundry list of women's health concerns, the abortion issue remains the most divisive. Hopefully, women can unify around a common respect for each other's decisions, even those we don't agree with.

Even though women have a way to go before ideals like equal pay for equal work and quality, respectful healthcare materialize, remember it can be done. A little more than 80 years ago, women finally got the right to have their ballots counted at the voting booths. Today, the issues that face women are more challenging and more controversial than ever, but I believe that no matter what the problem, we'll ultimately solve it together.

See you at the march.

A few things to say before I leave UMass

Matt Elder

Now that I'm a month away from finishing my junior year at UMass, I am forced to look back and reminisce about what happened throughout the three wonderful years I was here, and what is left to do in my last year.

So many memories, and so little time left. It seems like yesterday I moved into John Quincy Adams residence hall, got wasted, left my car parked outside the dorm because I was too drunk to drive at 4 p.m., got a $100 ticket for doing so, and walked back from Puffton with people I didn't know.

So I have a lot left to do in my tenure here.

Since drinking beer is a crucial aspect of any college career, I am forced to think of what is left to do on the alcoholic front. And, since drinking beer weekly gets boring, you have to switch it up and have some fun with it.

I need to do a bar crawl, a keg race and "Edwards 40s-hands." None, I have done but all will be done by June 2005 when I graduate.

Since I am not 21, I have not been able to enjoy a bar crawl across downtown Amherst. That'll change early next year. I also want to do a keg race, where about 20 people on a team go head to head and try to see who finishes a keg first.

A bar crawl is when a group of people break up into teams and go from bar to bar. You set a "par" or amount of drinks that each team must consume at that bar, and every drink over puts you under par. Like golf, the lowest score wins.

Finally, "Edwards 40s-hands" is when you tape "40s" to each of your hands and you can't take them off until you finish them.

Aren't I smart? Well, not really, but these ideas are pretty creative.

Well, not really since I didn't think of them, but they should be fun.

Next, I see all these people having crazy types of parties that I have yet to experience. One party that I'm talking about is a "Pimps and Hoes" party. I've seen the pictures of other people's "Pimps and Hoes" night, and it's like Halloween on crack!

Girls dress up about 10 times crazier than they do on Oct. 31, and the guys just dress like pimps, so that's self explanatory. I need to experience one of these, preferably hosting one, but regardless I need to attend one.

Trying to find your way out Morrill is like trying to find our way out of a fun house, blindfolded and handcuffed.

So my first day here I had to go to Morrill. I think it was Morrill 19 SE, but I'm not sure. To say the least, I got extremely lost, and I was with a junior girl who was lost with me. So, before I leave, I want to walk into Morrill and get lost as hell around the most confusing building on campus.

Trying to find your way out Morrill is like trying to find our way out of a fun house, blindfolded and handcuffed.

I also want to go into the School of Management building. I have yet to enter the building that the school has spent roughly $98 billion on. I have heard stories about how amazing the inside is, and I want to go in and enjoy it.

I also want to participate in another riot. Yes, I said it! I want to be in one more riot. I only got to attend the Diamondbacks/Yankees riot and the Patriots riot that year. I enjoyed it, and I don't mind saying it. Because I was off campus this year, I wasn't in Southwest to enjoy the 94 riots this past Fall.

However, I would not mind going back to the pyramids one more time and watching idiots jump off the dining commons while burning stuff. Hopefully it'll happen when the Red Sox win the World Series this year.

I have had a great time here in my three years, and I don't see it ending next year.

In defense of Commonwealth College

Stacy Canepari

With a reelection inevitable, it is time to stop arguing over what went wrong, or whether or not the election should have been ruled unconstitutional and/or ratified by the Student Government Association. Instead, everyone should be taking advantage of this time to learn more about the candidates that have decided to run again so all the students can cast an educated vote.

I am currently a sophomore student of the Commonwealth College. My participation in ComColl is allowing myself and others to receive a high quality education at an affordable price, while opening up a wide range of opportunities. Even amidst all the recent budget cuts the University has suffered, it can still pride itself on the prestigious and successful ComColl. It is shocking that a well-known student leader and representative at this University does not support this important asset to our campus.

A few months ago, Governor Mitt Romney (R-Mass.) doubled funding for ComColl. This funding will allow Commonwealth College to more effectively meet the needs of all students at the University, and in particular those students who are members of the College.

In response to this increased funding, the Student Senate proposed a motion to thank the Governor for his increased support of the University and of ComColl. For most of last year, the SGA issued a series of motions criticizing the state's lack of support for public higher education and imploring the state to take seriously its commitment to UMass. When the State House finally did increase funding for UMass, it was necessary and appropriate to thank them.

During debate over the motion, however, Eddie Bustamante argued against expressing gratitude to the Governor for his generous action. He claimed that ComColl is an elitist institution that does not deserve the support of the state or of the University. He said that the SGA should not thank someone who graciously gave more money to UMass, and whose future financial support is necessary for the continuing strength of the University.

I am appalled by Bustamante's accusations. ComColl is open to all students who achieve a 3.2 GPA. Unlike the honors colleges at some other state schools, students who are not admitted to ComColl when they apply to the University can still attend the University and join ComColl as soon as they have obtained a 3.2 GPA. Furthermore, honors classes are available to any student.

The existence of an honors college within the University actually makes the University more inclusive; it allows us to compete with private schools, such as Boston College and Boston University that many students of Massachusetts simply cannot afford to attend. As the reputation and strength of ComColl grows, every UMass degree becomes more valuable.

ComColl includes a public service program that serves members of the communities surrounding UMass, thus helping the school form a better connection with the towns around it.

ComColl includes a public service program that serves members of the communities surrounding UMass, thus helping the school form a better connection with the towns around it. ComColl even runs a scholarship office that helps UMass students — whether they are in ComColl or not — apply for prestigious fellowships and scholarships that open up a range of opportunities for all students.

It is disappointing that Bustamante does not realize how ComColl benefits all students at UMass. It is a program that serves more than 2,000 students. We must realize the importance of thanking the Governor for supporting a prestigious asset to our campus in order to encourage future financial support on our campus, instead of inaccurately labeling ComColl as "elitist."

I encourage every one of you to go out and educate yourselves about the elections. Find out where the candidates stand on the issues you truly care about, so you can figure out who will best represent all the students on this campus. I feel strongly about the Commonwealth College and the future financial situation of my school as a whole.

And that is why Eddie Bustamante has lost my vote.

A satire on college vanity

Andrew LaFlamme

Let me tell you about the vanity of college students. When I compare the hopes and expectations of students just entering college with the realities that become true at the end of senior year, I cannot help but smile. Not all, but many new students across the country are secretly harboring thoughts of personal magnificence, of how they will be ushered off into top job placement and into positions of prestige upon completion of their four year term. At the start, each student is convinced of his relevance and pleases himself with fictitious notions of his success.

The student of economics persuades himself that by his study he will acquire some kind of cunning knowledge on how to rise above his peers in the financial world. The gears in his head are actuated by images of country mansions with picket fences and of scenes of repose. I am afraid to say that this vain notion will be exposed when the student opens his economics book only to meet with abstracted formulae and to hear his professor expatiate on its theory.

And our students of psychology, who are going into private practice, fancy themselves as qualified to give advice to individuals who they seldom observe long enough to know. What can such insincerity amount to other than fraud? If you're not a Freud or a Jung, make us a more honest species by choosing another profession.

Our students of philosophy have given way to another species of vanity. After four years, these folks fancy themselves possessed of principles that the rest of the world has not yet discovered. But what seems to happen in our classrooms is that a group of vain scholars toy with complex ideas that they really do not understand. In fact, my friend Sam Analytic, a profound student of philosophy, when I asked him what he thought "such and such" was saying, his speech was incoherent and his thoughts confused because everything he read was ill digested. And he, one day said to me that, "I was abstractionizing last night on the nature of the universe and I have concluded by a priori reasoning that no two flowers bear similitude, but that each thing is different by minute degrees and that in the present system of things it is for the best of the whole." So in the name of clarity, I ask that you students quit this fooling and verbal folly and admit that you know nothing.

Another group that really smells of vanity consists of our students of foreign language. As if they have mastered the English Language, some of these students are motivated to cultivate exotic languages so that they may one day take their grand tour across the globe and articulate their finer sentiments in southern France. I imagine that this sort believe themselves to be possessed of delicacy and culture. But there are others motivated not by elegance, but by a desire to appear learned before the world. Under this class is my friend Walter WasteTime. He has recently confessed to me that by his calculations, he will have acquired the grammatical structure of 12 languages in about 45 years, though he won't have fluency in any of them. And my friend Laurence Learned is currently racking his brain in the memorization of the Dead Languages. Reality has shown us that we can seldom find the person who can speak, write, and interpret another language with facility.

After four years these folks fancy themselves possessed of principles that the rest of the world has not yet discovered. But what seems to happen in our classrooms is that a group of vain scholars toy with complex ideas that they really do not understand.

And there is another group that speaks with vehemence on political subjects. These are our sociology and anthropology majors. This amusing group has political philosophies that condemn wrongs in others but allow for vices in themselves, and who speak with such vehemence and passion on the affairs of the world, that one is easily convinced that are in possession of objective truth. If anyone has a question about race, gender, or equality, I beg that you refer yourself to our UMass Libertine Program.

And then we have our future doctors and lawyers who are studiously engaged in the pursuits of biology and legal studies. They, having given me the chance to talk with them, I have learned that their dreams are actuated by nothing more than a desire to overtake their friends from high school. Currently, my friend John Deception is revolving in his head images of himself in suit and slacks pleading trifles in the most exact logic and eloquent language. Mr. Deception is the sort of man who thinks a lawyer can get anything in life through a skilled use of logic and language.

I am afraid to say that he is not far from the truth on that point because last week one of his former colleagues, proved through abstruse reasonings, the innocence of a man believed to have killed 95,000 people. He believes the day will soon come when he will ride his horse around his country estate. And my dear Miss Rise is always pleasing herself with similar notions of triumph. Every night she has medical school dreams in which she fancies herself earning a sum sufficient to secure her a spacious estate and a suitor below herself. That Miss Rise is as envious as she is vain, is proved every time I give her an account of myself and her little neck and face turn as red as a crab. Miss Rise is the sort of person who is only comforted by hearing of others vices and failings since it convinces her of her victory over them.

Reader, you ask me what can you learn from this? That what we hope for is often vain, that the dreams of youth are blind, and that it takes the swift hand of reality to reform our imagination. That each person guards what every person desires to gain, and that blinded by envy, we live in mere competition with one another and seldom enjoy the good that is before us.

The dangers of playing 'dress-up'

In response to Stacy Kasdin's April 13 column, "Growing up too young." I'd just like to point out a few things. Yes, young girls dressing like strippers-in-the-making wandering around the Hampshire Mall is startling to many, but it's important to understand that what we're thinking when we see them is different from what they're thinking when they choose to wear the risqué outfits.

I have a 13-year-old sister who dresses the same as the girls mentioned in the article, and even though I've tried many times to explain why it's not exactly smart to dress in that manner, she continues to pull down her shirts to reveal padded-bra enhanced cleavage and to roll down her already-short shorts. Through repeated conversations with her I've realized she only chooses to dress this way in order to be considered 'hot' — an affirmation that she's attractive. She's not dressing like that to send out a message. To her it's only playing dress-up.

The celebrities that young teenage girls idolize portray a certain degree of sexuality that has gained them popularity in their professions. Over time, clothing companies have imitated the clothing worn by these celebrities, and suddenly that style is what all of the girls at school were wearing. In turn, my sister is just looking for a certain level of approval and popularity at an awkward age from her friends and the opposite sex.

It's scary for us to see younger children wandering around dressed as they are, because at older ages, dressing a certain way has the immediate correlation of acting a certain way. But to ease the minds of worried parents, (and older siblings,) I've witnessed my younger sister around a guy who she said was "so hot." She was the shyest I've ever seen her-forget worrying about her actual doing anything with this guy; she could barely start a conversation! This is what made me realize that the skin-revealing choice of clothing was only to get the 'hot' status that in turn would build her self-confidence; these girls don't yet understand exactly what's portrayed by that particular style.

On another note: young girls dressing the way they are could help to free women from stigmas commonly associated with how they dress. If girls wearing revealing clothing becomes the norm, one won't assume the girl wearing the clothing was "easy"-perhaps she dresses that way to get the temporary high that every girl does from having a certain someone look at her just a little longer than usual.

I still wish my little sister wouldn't dress the way she does. But we all did things to try to fit in, because before we have the confidence to be individuals we must have the self-confidence to do so. In part, this comes from having the support of our peers. My only advice to parents/older siblings is to gently remind the little women what message that type of clothing can send, and that her favorite pop star only dresses that way because that's the uniform a pop star's job requires.

Dissecting the language of liberals

In the Monday, April 12 edition of the Daily Collegian, Ben Duffy wrote a column denouncing "the language of liberals." The overall theme of Duffy's column is one that I've heard before from non-liberals: that they feel themselves to be oppressed and persecuted by leftist liberals (I'm lumping them together here because Duffy does). Referring to the terms used by liberals, Duffy says "it's intended to create a citizenry incapable of questioning the policies of 'the left,' because they lack the vocabulary to even form the thoughts." He then goes on to specifically refer to the pro-choice movement as a pro-abortion movement. Now it's his right to say this — it's his opinion, in his column. What's interesting though is how he doesn't mention that despite the ongoing threat of liberal "Newspeak," no one in the mass media calls the pro-lifers anti-choicers or pro-unwanted kids enthusiasts. For the most part, in the public forum, each of the sides in this debate are able to present themselves under the labels that they have chosen to identify with. The vocabulary is not lacking. The "right" isn't forced to wear a label slapped on it by the "left."

When talking about the liberals' definition of the word "progressive," Duffy tells us that it angers him, makes him feel invalidated and as though the suggestion is "that I really ought to just shut up and get with the program." The failure of liberals to don Duffy's labels and accept his definitions seems to be intolerable to him. He starts out his article warning that liberals are out to restrict the public narrative but he's obviously upset by the fact that liberal don't conform to his terminology. So who's being restrictive here?

In general liberals tend to disagree with conservatives. This opposition creates at least two sides to every issue and regardless of anything else that can be said of such a situation this much holds, it is an expansion from a one-sided uniform ideology and not a restriction of the thought process. Duffy ends his article claiming that liberals need reminding that they're not objective. No one really is, but most non-conservatives realize that the best way to approach objectivity is to allow for a diversity of perspectives while most conservatives have an "our way or the highway" attitude. It seems like conservatives can't tolerate being the minority or the proverbial voice of dissent because when the game is played by their rules minorities have no voices. Maybe Duffy might want to consider one of the pit falls of subjective reasoning that you tend to suspect others of what you know to be the truth in yourself.

Laugh at the folly of others

Last summer, The New TNN reinvented itself as Spike TV (however, not before some ridiculous legal woes with Spike Lee over his namesake.) With this new name came the "programming for men" campaign, as if most of the channels on television are not geared for men already. A mainstay and popular show that was held over from the transformation was "MXC: Most Extreme Elimination Challenge."

Ryan Aubert

Now shortened to "MXC," the show features Japanese contestants performing crazy stunts. It's like watching a "Jackass" game show, owing much of the humility to the contenders.

The stunts vary in each episode, but many are reoccurring favorites. One is called "Rotating Surfboard of Death" in which a surfboard is attached to a rotating center column. The contestant has to jump on the surfboard, jump over an obstacle, and then jump on another platform where their teammate is waiting. All of this is done while trying to avoid falling in the large pool of water below. And fall they do — hard. That's what makes it so funny.

Another game is called "Wall Bangers" in which the contestants are presented with a wall of various "doors." Some of these "doors" are just hard, solid walls, while others are simply made of paper. The unfortunate soul jumps headfirst through the "door," hoping it is made of paper.

It may be painful, but it is funny for us, the sick viewers that we are. In that sense, it's like "America's Funniest Home Videos" with laughs coming at the expense of pain from others. The difference is that these folks knew what they were getting into. Plus, they always show the player after their stunt, and they usually are smiling.

"MXC" is actually an imported show originally called "Takeshi's Castle." It was originally filmed in the late 1980s, which is apparent by what the contestants are wearing. What was not imported though is the translation. The show is humorously dubbed over, usually never matching the Japanese. It's almost like watching "Mystery Science Theater 3000," but instead of listening to people talk through a B-list film, you watch people endanger themselves.

Spike TV apparently got its hands on more episodes, because the third season of "MXC" starts Thursday night, with an "almost live special." I recommend watching it with friends and roommates, because it is definitely a group worthy revelry.

"MXC" airs on Spike TV Thursdays at 9 p.m.

Revenge times two

'Kill Bill' shines in conclusion; 'Punisher' falls flat

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

It's time to proclaim April "National Vigilante Month." It was just a few weeks back that The Rock — he of the impressive pectoral muscles — clobbered small-town-corrupting bad guys in the low-rent remake of the 1973 head-smasher "Walking Tall" and it'll be another week before Denzel Washington goes vigilante on the asses of the bad guys in "Man on Fire." This week alone we get not one, but two, films that celebrate and glorify the bloody art of revenge.

I must confess, and this may sound like blasphemy to all those who worship at the feet of Quentin Tarantino, that I was not the biggest fan of the director's original "Kill Bill." To me the film felt less like a movie than a smug, though admittedly dazzling, exercise in fan-boy self-indulgence. To me the movie felt arrogant; a hiply detached excuse for the ultimate movie-geek filmmaker to pander to his various cinematic obsessions — anime and gore-drenched samurai action flicks — in a way that felt vaguely contemptuous of the audience. As audacious and bravura as Tarantino's various inventions were, the movie lacked a genuine emotional core, something resembling humanity that could have grounded his stylized digressions. With its eye-popping, ironic action setpiece "Kill Bill Vol. 1" was indeed cool, but it was a cool movie that left me feeling just a bit cold.

After months with audiences holding their collective bated breath, Tarantino has delivered the second half of his grindhouse epic and has finally delivered the movie that "Vol. 1" promised. "Kill Bill Vol. 2" has the centered emotional grounding and heartfelt maturity lacked in the first installment and throws the entire enterprise in a whole new light. Tarantino is no longer an arrested adolescent indulging in his tastes for '70s exploitation schlock — he tempers his baser instincts with a grown-up wisdom that makes for a film as moving as it is ingenious.

Once again Tarantino cycles through beloved B-genres of old. This go-around has been heavily influenced by the spaghetti westerns of Sergio Leone, what with its gurgling Ennio Morricone-esque score (it's courtesy of rapper the RZA and Tarantino's brother-in-arms Robert Rodriguez) and desert vistas, but there are elements of Italian giallos and old-school martial arts melodramas complete with a white-bearded, hard-assed Chinese mentor. It's the same kind of mix tape assemblage that formed the structure of the first film, but this time the pacing is slower and more langurous. The time is longer too — well over two hours this time — and the action scenes are fewer, which gives the movie breathing room to stretch and flex its cinematic muscle. No longer is the screen crowded out by Tarantino's endless homages and gore-soaked ultraviolence; now we get the chance to understand the motives of Tarantino's band of misfits.

The movie begins with Tarantino's resident muse, Uma Thurman, bathed in rich, luxe black-and-white, staring straight at the camera and reiterating her single-minded goal of a "roaring rampage of revenge" against the assassins who obliterated her wedding party and left her for dead, a bullethole in her brain. Once again, the movie is split into chapters, beginning with a flashback to the Massacre at the Two Pines wedding chapel that is shot by Robert Richardson in stunning, light-drenched B&W; Richardson's work in this film and the last cement his status as one of our greatest living cinematographers.

Tarantino has a reputation for resuscitating the careers of has-beens and never-weres. Here, in this case, he does that to a gaggle of them. Thurman has never been better than when she's worked with Tarantino, giving the Bride (her real name, it turns out, is … ah, you didn't really think I was going to spoil it did you?) a fierce glint in her eye and a heart-wrenching humanity that pulls the character back to Earth. As the eponymous Bill (David Carradine), who has languished in dreck since the '70s TV hit "Kung Fu," acts with a wry, weary machismo and understated intelligence; this son of an acting dynasty is every bit as juiced and energized as he was in his younger days. Michael Madsen, slovenly yet with a glint of razor-edged sharpness, and Daryl Hannah, all smirking, vicious arrogance, manages to steal the scenes they are in, along with Michael Parks in a tiny, attention-grabbing role as a Colombian pimp.

Hannah and Thurman engage in a close-quarters fight that may be amongst the best-choreographed brawls documented on film, while Tarantino — with the judicious use of tense sound effects — builds one of the scariest buried alive sequences in film history (does anyone else have the sense that Tarantino may have added to cinema's legacy by freely borrowing from it?) When the Bride finally takes on Bill the action results in … talk. Lots of it. "Kill Bill Vol. 2" plunges into the realm of the domestic drama and it is as piquant and touching as the rest is savvy and eventful. When the climax rolls around, you don't feel catharsis or relief, but heartbreak. That's Tarantino's greatest achievement as an auteur, and an indication that he's becoming a real filmmaker as well.

There's revenge in "The Punisher" but it's not nearly as artfully staged as in "Kill Bill." The movie is based on a Marvel comic book, but it's really just a thuggish and junky vigilante cartoon, the kind of overheated testosterone fest that would have felt right at home amongst the early action-hero escapades of Stallone and Segal. Where "Kill Bill" was fleet and light-footed, "The Punisher" manages to be glum and leaden, more brutal and preposterous than imaginative or cool. This movie does more than lives up to its title.

Frank Castle, the character that would become known as the Punisher, is unique amongst Marvel characters in that he's not a superhero — he's just an angry guy with lots of guns and a high tolerance for pain. In the movie, he becomes an FBI agent who witnesses his entire family — not just wife and son, but mother, father, cousins, nieces, everyone — gunned down at a family reunion in retaliation for a sting operation that took the life of a son of Howard Saint, apparently the top money launderer in

Allien borrows and remixes a new 'Collection'

By Timothy Gabrielle
Collegian Staff

Remix collections are, by their very nature, tragic creatures. Bastardization and necrophilia by trade, the remix thrives on digging up corpses and creating a zombie movie or treating live pieces like automatons for one's own amusement. It is an artform wherein one collaborates with an unwilling partner.

Only in music can this artform be properly expressed. Picasso never rearranged the Mona Lisa nor did Kafka morph Hamlet into a gigantic insect. Music though, and electronic music in particular, is so communal that anyone who refuses to let their work be tooled and tinkered with is automatically branded a Lars Ulrich. Refusing to share can nearly boot oneself of the artistic roll call, so musicians soon learn that they'd better share wisely.

Ellen Allien is a good person to share with. Last year's outstanding slice of German nu-electro ranks among the best the genre ever produced. One would be hard pressed to find a more gorgeously distinct aesthetic in electronic music than her lead single "Trash Scape." Robotic, angular, and funky all at once, Allien's music proves that no matter how hard we try to muster a scene it's still being done better overseas.

Reviewing a remix disc can be a frustrating task. Does an artist score points for originality? How much creativity can be allowed before succumbing to blatant irreverence and parody of the original? If one finds nothing wrong with the original, how does one free themselves from that prejudice to accept the original on its own terms? Likewise if a song sucks, does it deserve such a carefully modulated and devoted amending? Preparing judgment for a remix album is almost to observe two albums all at once.

I've only heard two of the original tracks from Allien's latest, drearily named "Remix Collection." My familiarity with several of the names on the tracklisting leads me to believe that most of these compositions are pure Allien, regardless of initial intentions. Going into an album without any pretext for eight of the 10 songs helps cast most of these worries aside and allows one to focus on product rather than process. The product, though going nowhere near the intricacy and innovation, proves a nice companion piece to 2003's "Sensucht." In fact, it's amazing how well the tracks go together.

Ellen Allien
'Remix Collection'
BPitch Control

Being that half of the tracks feature Allien vocals anyway, or Allien-styled voice pitch instruments (she uses a vocoder more marvelously than perhaps any other musician since Laurie Anderson.) There is no need to discredit the talents of her peers, however. Most of them are working in the same general milieu and have simply added supplements of Allien's unique flavoring.

Golden Boy and Miss Kitten (whose names have been reordered in the liner notes for some reason) donate their ubiquitous dancefloor ballad "Rippin Kitten" to be mashed up as the album's closer. The result is actually pretty straight, however, the disenfranchised Kitten here seems more motivated to murder via mechanized forces of oppression thanks the song's new bounce. Despite its virulent minimalist hook, the problem of significance arises. Quite simply put, the original is better in all ways, though Allien tries her damndest to put a gracious spin on the track. Looking at the album as a 10-fruit blend of the current crop of electro all stars with the secret ingredient of Ellen Allien, the track works triumphantly, but taken alone as a distorted picture through the goggles of German techno, the result is like Britney Spears covering the Rolling Stones. Take off the goggles, kid. You can see better without them.

Apparat's "Koax" gets refreshingly toasted with some deep, dark, malted synths and a touch of the Allien vocal expertise. Her unmistakably alien Allien "aaahs" come soaring into the song almost immediately and carry the track on a cracked, curvy voyage. Those characteristic vocoded harmonics resemble an intergalactic femme-bot who has smoked too many cigarettes, listened to too much Cocteau Twins, and ultimately comes down way too hard on herself. She struggles and gurgles to get the words out, but comes up only with harmonically bent signals akin to the angelic conversations of magical adepts of the highest order. Like the choir strands of 10CC's "I'm Not in Love" brought down to the single individual in the back row aching in desperation, the crackly and punchy song illuminates a plangent and desperate disposition bets expressed by murmurs restrained by a heavy heart.

"Koax" a trademark-laden feature of Alien's is the album's standout single.

In fact, to a listener who speaks not a word of the language, most of Allien's best tracks are either the ones crooned in prolonged phonemic sessions or those uttered in German. Her English verses tend to be little, incessantly chanted poetic cadences that get flooded with meaning in the production room, rather than through the pen. The German tracks work in the same way, but to an international ear, it represents a clearer universal vision of space-age melody. Though she dabbles in modern technological forms, Allien's closest kin is the captured German songstress at the end of Kubrick's "Paths of Glory." Even the abusive, stolid, and barbaric soldiers hum along to her ethereal verse, despite their lack of comprehension of the tongue.

The newly mastered version of OMR's "The Way We Have Chosen" incorporates digital turntable scratches in a way that has completely eluded all but the most prominent auteurs of the artform. Here, they are played as glitchy background supplements to the choppy, evasive low-ends and untweaked guitar loops. Like the creaky screeches and blurps familiar to Mouse on Mars fans, the scratches act like friendly little squeaky gremlins bouncing around the pipes and coax cables of Allien's Bauhaus living space as she recorded the song.

Perhaps the greatest departure and the most commercial track on the album is the pumping House throb of the mix of Gut-Humpe's "Butterfly." Another one of Allien's hallmarks is her oddly poised body-shaking drumbeats. Those techfunk stabs are replaced on "Butterfly" with straight ahead four-on-the-floors. The flutter of high-pitched vocal moan (not Allien's) and warm strings reach back, but not way back to the '80s as many of her peers would. Instead, she haunts the tomb of the acid and ambient house familiarized by old school relics like Renegade Soundwave, Sweet Exorcist, and LFO. It's hard to fault such a memorable homage, especially when it steps so completely out of character to do so.

If they had invented the hovering pod by now like so many sci-fi films have promised, Ellen Allien would be hovering above us all at cross-cultural raves while spinning intergalactic computations and showering neoteric, melodic electrostardust all over. The result transcends the remix, but humbles itself just enough to let it be called such.

Eleven Eleven's new disc shows a band's growth

By Deborah Geiger
Collegian Staff

Philadelphia has always been known as the city of brotherly love, which might explain the expressive, impressive, and undeniably familial dynamic of the band Eleven Eleven, whose new album; "Head" has been released.

Comprised of members Jeff Giuliani on vocals, guitar, and keyboard, Rich Francheta on drums, Eric Mallon on guitars, and Jerry Ramos on bass, Eleven Eleven came together in 2000 and hasn't looked back since. "Head" is Eleven Eleven's latest full length release and is the follow-up to their 2003 EP "Sunday Grey." Some of the keyboard-produced instrumentals on this disk are great but many of them sound a little too electronic; sounding like some strange dream sequence at times.

Eleven Eleven
'Head'
Orchard

Starting off the album is "Forever." This spacey array of intense lyrics and mellowed out instrumentals is refreshing and confusing all at once. When Giuliani sings, "A look of disbelief, that's the way. And I'm jumping off the world, into the sky of you, the deepest shades of blue," it sounds a little trippy, but it works with the kind of guitar effects Mallon uses.

"The Queen of Magazines" is an interesting song with lyrics like, "Complicate the always cool, be for real or be for fake, there's not a surface you can't break…you can't break… you won't break." The band seems to be talking to the media or a specific girl with this track. This lyrical ambiguity keeps "Head" fresh, but sometimes it makes it difficult to extract the meaning from the songs.

"Every Ill in the World" begins with a deep bass and a layering of electronically produced string instrumentals, violin-like and enchanting. "How come the pieces don't flow and the back is the cave within? Last fleeting chance for goodbye is gone" Guiliani whines. "What if I told you that I was indifferent?" he sings, making one feel that maybe he is.

"Crush" is a song that speaks volumes. "I'll crush you, darling… I promise you won't feel a thing at all…nothing at all" are lyrics we can all relate to, at least in theory. Ramos expertly plays bass to the powerful voice of Giuliani, who at times seems like a throwback to a 1960s British pop rocker complete with the tearful crooning and singing out of range.

"Eye Con" is a much faster, almost 1980s sounding anthem where Guiliani's vocals really stand out. "Broken Bird" is a song about personal demons and has potential to be used on American Idol in 10 years.

"All these suffocating minds … they live underneath my rug. I keep them there. I keep you there …. But you don't spread your wings." Guiliani belts out not only words but also the experience behind them. It dares the listener to think about spreading one's own wings.

"Wish I didn't frighten so easily… doesn't seem to make it easier for me. Or for anybody. Turn the lights off when you leave" begins the finale song, "Cars Spinning into Walls", a well-chosen conclusion for this dreamy, somewhat fearful amalgamation of songs. Background vocals are used creatively and subtly in this blend of simple lyrics and basic instrumentals, a classic combination for any good song. "Turn the lights off when you leave" the background whispers as the song fades out. Overall, these songs are catchy, melancholy, and fun to listen to, and have an element of excitement in them, which is the most promising element in any new band.

Eleven Eleven is an up and coming band whose new album is definitely worth checking out. Despite their wonderful potential and the impressive "brotherly" feel, they might want to try variations on their melancholy, rainy day theme.

Perhaps collaborating with songwriting tasks may prevent the band from being muddled in Guiliani's blustery little world of bed bugs and boogie monsters, and move onto other, deeper, more interesting themes. "Head" is a good second album, but we should expect a lot more from this quizzical quartet in the future.

Getting even on the big screen

Tampa. Castle himself is beaten, shot (point blank in the chest too) and blown off a pier – yet he manages to survive, with only the tiniest of scars on his body.

It's that type of overkill that crushes the movie. "The Punisher" is ripe with ludicrousness, and as the movie goes along, it grows more numbing with each scene of assaultive violence. The director, Jonathan Hensleigh (he helped write the screenplay for "Armageddon"), is no Tarantino. He's a competent filmmaker, but he stages the movie with ham-fisted solemnity. "Kill Bill" works with the finesse of a swordsman, but "The Punisher," for all its unearned gravity, operates with a grim and bludgeoning ferocity.

Thomas Jane, who has the sculpted athlete's body to play a vengeful anti-heroic hunk, plays Castle with a harsh monotone, which may just be the right performance for a script as plodding and lifeless as this. John Travolta, looking like he's angling to make "Swordfish, Part 2," makes Saint inexplicably swishy and nerdy, as if he decided that a villain need not project anything remotely resembling menace.

There are a couple sequences of wit, such as Castle's rumble with a Russian assassin in his grunge-tenement apartment, and when Rebecca Romijn-Stamos gives a touching and tender performance as the abused and frightened neighbor down the hall. But the violence here feels strangely cruel and sadistic, but we're meant to get off on it because Castle is attacking the bad guys — the faceless extras who murdered his family.

The movie pays token lip service to the line Castle's crossing (his actions are as bad, if not worse, than the villain's) but it always goes back to making a fetish of its bloodshed. That is, when it bothers to be violent; "The Punisher" spends way too much time with Castle planting the seeds of doubt within Saint's organization, when he could have just as easily taken out Saint in one fell swoop. But that's the level of thought that's been put into "The Punisher," which lumbers through the vigilante genre in the way that "Kill Bill" flies right through it.

Straight from the pages of Marvel, "The Punisher" is the latest hero to grace the world of film.

Senior outfielder KC Budrewicz takes a cut against St. Bonaventure earlier this season. UMass will put its 15-game winning streak on the line against rival Connecticut this afternoon in Storrs, Conn.

Minutewomen to face UConn

the kind of numbers that you see and the power ... it's there," Sortino said. "Hilary means the world to us on the field, defensively, with the plays she makes. I mean, yeah, the numbers grab everybody's eyes, but the plays she makes are incredible. She's everybody."

Kelli Arnold followed up Puglia's recognition earlier in the week by garnering A-10 honors as co-Pitcher of the Week. Arnold (11-5) hurled a complete game shutout against Boston College last Thursday, and combined for another shutout alongside Barbara LaFogg against St. Bona on Sunday.

Whether Arnold, LaFogg or sophomore ace Jenna Busa gets the start today, the Minutewomen are likely to be involved in a classic pitchers' duel.

The Huskies bring to the table their own ace in the form of two-time Big East Pitcher of the Week Jessica Gurney (13-9). Through 129.2 innings pitched, she has compiled a 2.27 earned run average, with four shutouts and 122 strikeouts.

Senior co-captain Maggie Arbugast leads the Huskies in just about every major category, including average (.345), hits (39), slugging percentage (.442), and on-base pct. (.392), adding a threat from the batter's box as well.

But ultimately, the game will come down to one factor.

"Mentality," Sortino said, pointing lightly to her temple. "If the team is aggressive and mentally ready, we'll close the door on Connecticut."

James named top rookie

By Tom Withers
Associated Press

CLEVELAND – More than 45 minutes late to a news conference, LeBron James was one teen who didn't need an excuse.
He's exhausted.

"They had to drag me out bed to put this suit on," James said Tuesday, when he won the NBA Rookie of the Year award. "I didn't want to get out. I thought I was going to practice when they woke me up this morning."

Hey, saving the Cleveland Cavaliers is hard work, and the 19-year-old James put the final touch on a remarkable season by becoming the rookie award's youngest recipient.

"I knew I would make an impact this year," said James, who easily beat Denver's Carmelo Anthony, also 19. "And I guess I did."

The 6-foot-8 guard made the jump from preps to pros look easy, somehow living up to the unprecedented hype. The No. 1 overall draft pick did more than just post jaw-dropping statistics night after night: He transformed Gund Arena into a hot spot, and he gave Cleveland fans reason to hope.

"He proved to all of us that he is up for a challenge. He exceeded all of our expectations and just kept raising the bar," Cavaliers owner Gordon Gund said.

James received 508 points, including 78 of a possible 118 first-place votes, to become the first Cleveland rookie honored.

Anthony, who left Syracuse after leading it to an NCAA championship as a freshman, finished with 430 points, including the other 40 first-place votes.

"People are going to think what they want to think," Anthony said. "I don't really know what else I could have done."

Dwyane Wade of the Miami Heat was third with 117 points in balloting by sports writers and broadcasters. Players received 5 points for a first-place vote, 3 for second and 1 for third.

"I thought it could go either way," said James, who praised Anthony for having a phenomenal season. "I thought it could be a split decision."

In any other year, Anthony probably would have won the award for statistics similar to James' and helping the Nuggets go from 17 victories to the playoffs.

But this season belonged to James, from his 25-point, nine-rebound, six-assist NBA debut at Sacramento through his resounding windmill dunk to close his season at Madison Square Garden.

James followed Amare Stoudemire of the Phoenix Suns as the second straight rookie honored after turning pro directly from high school. But that's where the similarities end.

No player entered the league to as much fanfare as James. And the Akron native delivered on the court, while his wine-and-gold No. 23 jersey led NBA sales and his image was marketed from coast to coast.

James averaged 20.9 points, 5.5 rebounds and 5.9 assists, joining Oscar Robertson and Michael Jordan as the only NBA rookies to average at least 20-5-5.

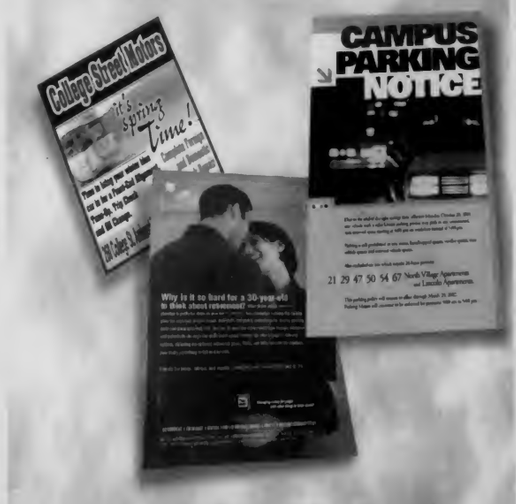
"He just has it. It's all his attitude," Cavaliers coach Paul Silas said. "He has a knack for doing and saying the right thing and not in an antagonistic way. That's just not in him. He's humble, and he's about winning more than anything."

Like any rookie, James had his share of struggles while adjusting to the pros. He learned to accept the punishment before dishing out some of his own.

On March 27, he scored 41 points against New Jersey to become the youngest player in league history to break 40. He scored more than 30 points 13 times, and made countless moves that defied description.

"They try to take away your manhood in this league, and they couldn't get mine," said James, who was to receive his trophy Tuesday night at the NBA store in New York. "I could have averaged around 25 points if I could have gotten a lot of calls."

A year after going 17-65, the Cavs went 35-47 and finished ninth in the Eastern Conference, one spot out of the playoffs. James also helped home attendance rise from 11,497 to 18,288 — the highest increase ever for a team that didn't move into a new building.



Plenty of those new fans came to see James, who actually considers football his first love.

"I could have made it to the NFL," James said. "But I probably would have come in with Maurice and been sent back to college."

Cleveland Cavaliers guard LeBron James, the No. 1 pick in the 2003 Draft, was named NBA Rookie of the Year on Tuesday.

Dejá vu, all over again

Beanpot again proves unforgiving for Ratliff as UMass drops heartbreaker to Northeastern

By Mike Marzelli
Collegian Staff

Forgive Scott Ratliff if he never wants to pitch in the Baseball Beanpot again.

A year after blowing a 6-4 lead and earning the loss by surrendering four ninth-inning runs to Harvard at Fenway Park, UMass' southpaw closer was again thrust into a late-inning situation in the annual tournament — this time against Northeastern at Brockton's Campanelli Stadium.

Northeastern	4
UMass	3

However while the venue and the opponent were different, the results were quite the same.

With the score tied at three in the bottom of the eighth, Husky shortstop Arman Sidhu doubled to knock UMass starter Devin Barnett from the game in favor of Ratliff.

After striking out rightfielder Chris Emanuele, Ratliff walked centerfielder Chris Heriot on a wild pitch, allowing Sidhu to advance to third and setting up runners at the corners for Paul Koslowski.

However the Northeastern first baseman never got a chance to drive in the go-ahead run with his bat, as the first base umpire called Ratliff for a balk, awarding second base to Heriot and the plate to Sidhu and giving the Huskies a 4-3 lead.

The Maroon and White proceeded to go down 1-2-3 in the top of the ninth, as rightfielder Curt Szado flied to right to end the game and send the Minutemen to the consolation game in heartbreaking fashion for the second consecutive year.

UMass returns to action tomorrow afternoon in the consolation game of the 2004 Baseball Beanpot.

Dave Pellegrine earned the win for NU after working 3-1/3 innings of scoreless ball, allowing no hits and two walks while striking out two.

Barnett was the tough-luck loser for UMass, allowing six hits and three earned runs while striking out three in seven solid innings.

Northeastern wasted little time getting on the board in the bottom of the first inning against Barnett. After the freshman righthander hit leadoff hitter Brad Czarnowski with a pitch and Sidhu singled, Barnett was able to retire Emanuele on a popup to first before Heriot singled to right, scoring Czarnowski and sending Sidhu to third.

Koslowski then followed with a sacrifice fly, scoring Sidhu and giving Northeastern a 2-0 edge.

The Huskies added an unearned run to cap their scoring in the first, as Heriot stole second and scored on a two-base error by UMass second basemen Anthony Santos.

The Maroon and White chipped away at Northeastern's lead in the third when Santos walked, advanced to second on a wild pitch and scored on a single by junior centerfielder Jason Twomley, who moved up to second after Czarnowski committed an error on the play.

Senior captain Mike Athas followed with a groundout, moving Twomley to third where he then scored on an RBI groundout by sophomore catcher Frank Curreri.

UMass tied the game in the top of the sixth thanks to the speed of Derek Durepo. With two outs in the inning, the sophomore outfielder walked, stole second, advanced to third on a single by Santos and scored the tying run by stealing home as part of a double-steal, with Santos taking second.

COLLEGIAN / MASS MEDIA RELATIONS

Minuteman closer Scott Ratliff suffered through another shaky performance in the Baseball Beanpot last evening in Brockton.

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

The April 17-18 Knecht Cup provided the No. 21 Massachusetts women's crew team with another chance to shine.

In a very short, three-race season, UMass rowers have faced 30 schools and defeated all but one. The Cup proved to be the largest test for the eight-time defending A-10 champion Minutewomen — a test that UMass passed with flying colors.

The Maroon and White finished first in the 23-school competition, which featured Division I powerhouses Boston College, Kansas and Buffalo.

For the second straight year, the Massachusetts varsity eight swept the competition, finishing first in the preliminary, semifinal and final heats.

Battling against a strong headwind, the varsity eight fired out of the gate into an early lead that it never relinquished, crossing the finish line in 6:57.00.

Massachusetts was the only team to finish in less than seven minutes, as BC finished second in 7:03.4 and Fordham took bronze with a time of 7:13.4.

"The varsity eight never trailed and looked very strong," coach Jim Dietz said. "By the end of the day the varsity eight's times had dropped, because after racing three times in 80 degree weather exhaustion began taking a toll."

Faith Harkins and Cat Gariepy led the UMass varsity eight, powering the team from the one and two seats respectively.

Carrie Champigny, the boat's coxswain, steered the squad to victory on Saturday and Sunday with help from Lea Jakobsen in the six seat and Katie O'Brien in the four. Haley McGrath filled her usual spot at stroke, while Lizzy Boyle, Lauren Cromwell, and Stephanie Hoph rounded out the first varsity eight.

The sole loss for the 2004 UMass varsity eight came at the hands of Brown on April 10.

At the time the Bears were ranked fourth in the country and pegged as a contender for the national title.

A five second differential decided the race.

Despite a near-perfect weekend, the Massachusetts junior varsity eight encountered a snag that likely prevented a UMass victory.

During the J.V. eight competition, UMass cruised into the lead at the 5,000 and 1,000 meter marks. But an equipment malfunction on the last leg of the race caused the slide correlated with the six seat to snap.

This essentially forced the crew to finish the race with six rowers, because when one oar is rendered useless, a rower on the opposite side of the boat is forced to stop rowing so that the shell doesn't veer off course.

"It's unfortunate that the J.V.'s we're knocked off course but those things happen," Dietz said. "I was impressed that they were able to finish fifth considering two people weren't able to row to the finish line."

Next Saturday, UMass will return to Collingswood, N.J., where it will attempt to duplicate last weekend's success. Dietz believes

UMass will have an advantage having raced on the same course two weeks in a row, but realized other A-10 teams participated in the Knecht Cup as well.

"The A-10's shouldn't be too much of a challenge for the (UMass) varsity eight," Dietz said.

"We're getting faster but so is Fordham, St. Joe's and URI. The conference is improving but they aren't quite up to our speed yet."

Thornton, Bruins feeling the sting of another first round playoff exit

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON — Joe Thornton stood tall in the Bruins' somber locker room after his team's historic collapse that hurt him more than his damaged ribs.

"We had such a good year," he said. "This loss was devastating."

The words came slowly from Boston's captain after Monday night's 2-0 loss to Montreal in Game 7.

He had taken shots to dull the pain and played in all seven playoff games against the Canadiens. Easing the pain of the team's third straight first-round elimination may be tougher with the possibility of a labor dispute forcing curtailment or cancellation of next season.

"We don't know if we're going to play or not," the 6-foot-4 Thornton said after his scoreless series. "So this is going to last a long, long time."

The Bruins lost for the first time in 18 series that they led 3-1. The Canadiens had been 0-12 when trailing 3-1. So it's not surprising that Thornton, his injury limiting his effectiveness, considered the pain of the loss greater than the ache of his torn rib cartilage.

Boston had entered the series seeded second in the Eastern Conference. The midseason acquisitions of veterans Michael Nylander, Sergei Gonchar and Jiri Slegr helped. Rookie Andrew Raycroft emerged as a top goalie.

The Bruins were 27-8-6-3 in their last 44 regular-season games. Then they lost three games in five days to the seventh-seeded Canadiens, two of them in Boston.

They played very well in Monday night's finale after having some defensive lapses in the previous three games. But Richard Zednik's goal with 9:08 left in the game on Montreal's first shot of the third period was the turning point. He also scored an empty net goal.

He made it 1-0 when the puck ricocheted directly in front of the net after Alex Kovalev's shot hit the side of the goal.

About a half hour after the game, Raycroft was asked if he had replayed that goal in his mind.

"Six thousand times," he said. "I played it exactly the way I wanted to play it."

The Bruins know the series never should have come to that after they won Game 4 on Glen Murray's overtime goal. The Canadiens then won 5-1 in Boston and 5-2 in Montreal, setting up the seventh game.

"I thought we got our bad games out of the way," Raycroft said.

The Bruins have won just one playoff series in 10 years and none in the last five. They've had seven coaches over that span, but Mike Sullivan's job appears safe after his first full season as coach.

Two years ago, Montreal was seeded eighth when it knocked off top-seeded Boston. Last year, New Jersey eliminated the Bruins.

Three seasons, three first-round exits.

"This is going to hurt the most," forward Mike Knuble said. "I thought we had a lot more hockey in us as a group and that's the most disappointing."

The Bruins had rebounded well after an early season slump. Thornton led them in scoring, Murray scored 32 goals, 18-year-old rookie Patrice Bergeron far exceeded expectations and defenseman Nick Boynton developed as a team leader.

Only six teams gave up fewer than the 188 goals Boston allowed. The acquisitions of defenseman Gonchar, an offensive threat, and Nylander, both from Washington in early March, helped the attack.

So the Bruins expectations were high entering the playoffs, but Montreal goalie Jose Theodore got better as the series went on and stopped 32 shots in Game 7.

Before the series, Sullivan's only description of Thornton's problem was an "upper body injury," hoping to minimize the chances opponents would target the affected area. After the series, Sullivan revealed its true nature. Some players miss six weeks with torn rib cartilage, but Thornton sat out just six days after getting hurt with two regular-season games left.

"He was absolutely miserable the first couple of games," Knuble said.

"Considering the pain he was in, he's the toughest guy I know," Boynton said.

Thornton doesn't expect to need surgery so he should be fine by next season, whenever it begins. The current collective bargaining agreement expires Sept. 15.

Minutewomen to put streak on the line against UConn

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

Forget about the 15-game win streak for now.

When the Massachusetts (22-11) and Connecticut (18-18) softball teams square off today in Storrs, Conn. it'll mean more than just a game.

It's a rivalry — it's bragging rights.

"You could put them on any field, home or away, it's always a barnstormer; always, always, a big ball game for both teams," coach Elaine Sortino said. "It's an incredible rivalry, with an incredible history and tradition. They're [UConn] always tough to play, and they're tougher at home than they are away."

Although the Huskies hold the all-time series lead at 40-39-2, (39-36-1 against Sortino-coached teams), the games have never strayed from excitement.

Last season, for example, saw the Minutewomen and Huskies exchange losses to split the season series at one apiece. UConn took the first game on April 15, 2003, when an Elisa Brinkworth double scored home Megan Elder on an unearned run to snap UMass's 14-game winning streak. The Minutewomen bit back a week later, however, erasing a 2-0 deficit with the help of a three-run fourth inning to down the Huskies, 6-2.

But if the Maroon and White is to hang around this year, a performance like last Sunday's against St. Bonaventure will not satisfy.

"Based on Sunday's game, [we need to improve on] everything," Sortino said. "We didn't execute the small ball stuff. You got to get that stuff done. You might have only one opportunity to score a run in a game, as you go down to the end of the season, so you've got to at least be able to get runners in scoring position."

At least one player has been able to find ease in bringing home those runners. Junior infielder Hilary Puglia has been on a tear as of late, amassing a five-RBI effort in Sunday's doubleheader sweep of the Bonnies and a home run to accompany four RBIs in an 11-6 downing of Boston University on April 12.

Currently leading the team in average (.340) and hits (35), she racked up both ECAC and Atlantic 10 honors earlier this week as Player of the Week.

"I'm just seeing the ball real well, I'm more relaxed," Puglia said.

"I think [Hilary]'s an outstanding hitter. I think she's doing what she can do, I think

Illegal downloading remains issue on college campuses

By Curtis Killian
Collegian Correspondent

Despite lawsuits filed by the Recording Industry Association of America against 532 illegal file sharers last month — including 89 users of university networks — many University of Massachusetts students are continuing to download copyright files illegally.

In an effort to deter illegal file sharing and raise awareness of its consequences, the RIAA first began to sue individual computer users in September. In the latest barrage of suits, the RIAA focused more on college students and sent subpoenas to 36 universities nationwide. So far no copyright violations on the UMass campus have resulted in lawsuits, but there are UMass students who say they're still downloading music illegally.

Rosio Alvarez, Office of Information Technologies associate chancellor said that since OIT does not monitor content of network traffic, the only way to know of individual student violations is through notices from the RIAA and other such associations listing the names of particular offenders.

"The amount of notices coming to the campus from the RIAA has remained constant over the recent months," she said. In addition, OIT has recently received an increase in notices from film-related agencies such as the Motion Picture Association of America, Universal Studios and Paramount Pictures, as well as software houses such as Entertainment Software Association and Symantec, Alvarez said.

"When we do receive a notice we turn off the student's network port in her or his dorm room," Alvarez said. "The student is then placed into a 'safety net' that allows access to an Isolated network with web pages that instruct the student on what to do and external Internet access is disabled."

Although it rarely occurs, Alvarez explained that "multiple offenders can be sent to the dean of students for further discipline."

Allison, a junior at UMass who spoke on condition of anonymity, claims that in November 2002 her Internet access and phone line were cut off. OIT informed her that the FBI had sent a list of excessive downloaders, and she was on it.

"They made me sign a sheet that said I promised to never download again," she said.

To avoid risk, Allison said she no longer leaves files in a shared directory after she downloads them, a common tactic used by illegal downloaders to hide from the watchful eye of the RIAA.

At the heart of the downloading dilemma is an ongoing moral debate surrounding free digital access to pirated copyright material, an issue reigned on March 31 when a Canadian judge ruled in favor of the sharing of copyright music.

Josh Kiggans, a UMass junior majoring in jazz performance, says that he has purposely deleted all of his pirated files, and no longer downloads music. The RIAA threat slightly affected his decision, he said, but it was more of a deci-

Nokes vetoes ALANA office charter

Senators engage in heated debate; fail to override veto

By Melissa Blankstein
Collegian Staff

President Jared Nokes vetoed the Office of ALANA Affairs charter and it was brought to a vote at the Student Government Association meeting last night.

"We fund about $107,000 for OAA," he said. "And it should be related to where it gets its money from."

Nokes found fault in two places of the charter. First, in the mission statement, he did not like the inclusion of the faculty and administration because it is a student-funded organization. Second, in the goals, Nokes did not like the power given to the OAA to not have to bring proposals through the SGA.

"We can't have any office of the SGA just allowed to make policy proposals and skip over the Senate," he said. "I would just like to see it discussed."

Senator Gladys Franco was angered, calling Nokes a racist.

"This has turned into somewhat of a joke," she said. "And I think it's sad. I think this is another excuse for you [Nokes] to screw with the ALANA community one more time. It is just one more strike. It must be fun to you ... I think it's blatant racism ... sometimes you have to call things what they are."

"We've talked about this mission statement a lot," Franco said, of the committee meetings. "It creates a positive environment for the campus and we didn't want to exclude anybody."

Senator Dan Poznanter said that Nokes was not reading the sentence with all of its clauses properly.

"Support A, B, and C insofar as it supports A," he said, laying it out simply. The students represented A, B and C, the faculty and administration, were only mentioned in regards to students. "It is a fundamental misunderstanding of the rest of the clause."

Nokes pointed out that in 1994 the OAA was created, but it was not until the 1995-1996 school year that the Senate asked for charters from OAA, the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy, Student Legal Services Office and Commuter Services and Housing Resource Center. Until this year, only SCERA and Commuter Services had a charter. Student Legal Services' new charter was passed last fall.

Speaker Chris Eckel said that there are no drastic consequences for the OAA not to have a charter until next fall, when the charter might have the next opportunity to get passed. However, it would only help the OAA to have it as quickly as possible.

"There wouldn't be any consequences of the Office being open. Depending on whose opinion you believe, we have or have not had an charter since the moment it started," he said. "The charter would give it legitimacy in the eyes of many."

Nokes argued for his veto in his debate.

"If there is no charter for the office, then there is no SGA oversight of the office," he said. "I sincerely want a charter. I started the process."

Nokes started the initiative as Speaker over last summer.

The Senate needed a two-thirds vote to override Nokes' veto. They failed to achieve it.

Associate Speaker Craig Goldschmidt said after the meeting that the charter did not need to specify that it worked solely for student advocacy because that is what it means to be an agency of the SGA.

James Brennan, chair of the Administrative Affairs Committee, said that the charter will be looked at during the beginning of his next committee meeting. He will try and have it put on next week's agenda.

Next week, Patrick Higgins, chair of the Ways and Means Committee, will be presenting the SGA budget for next year.

Brian Long, former secretary of university policy, announced that a subcommittee of the Board of Trustees approved of parental notification. The parental notification entails parents receiving a letter when their child abuses certain alcohol policies. The Board will meet at UMass on May 3. Also, a proposal is in the works for community billing.

The Senate heard two more motions and adjourned at 10 p.m.

Again, they debated the Pledge

Community remembers UMass professor tomorrow

By Michelle Rivera
Collegian Staff

A memorial service will be held tomorrow afternoon in commemoration of a long-time distinguished faculty member, Professor Oliver Thomas Zajicek, who served the University of Massachusetts community for 45 years.

The service will take place at 3:30 p.m. In Peter's Auditorium, Goessman Laboratory, room 64. The service will honor and remember the 45 years that Zajicek taught, conducted research and served the UMass community before falling ill in the spring of 2003.

Peter Kerr, an analytical chemist and former UMass student, worked with Zajicek while he was a graduate student to later earn both his master's and doctorate.

Kerr said Zajicek, or Tom, as his colleagues refer to him as, was a pioneer in the study of environmental chemistry and will be sorely missed.

"His door was always open to students and he spent countless hours helping and counseling students," Kerr said.

Another colleague of Tom's described him as "one heck of a chemist."

Zajicek was born in Detroit on Oct. 5, 1928. He received his bachelor's degree in chemistry in 1951 from Baldwin-Wallace College in Ohio. He received his master's in 1958, and his doctorate

Conservation Law Enforcement training program reaches out

By Adrienne Bossi
Collegian Correspondent

Graduates from the Conservation Law Enforcement Officer training program, offered through Continuing Education, spent yesterday afternoon talking with students in an effort to inform them on the benefits on being in the program.

The training program qualifies graduates for law enforcement positions in national, state and local parks.

The program has been offered at UMass since 1989 and is headed by David Swendsen. Graduates of the program have been placed at jobs in Grand Canyon National Park, Everglades National Park and the U.S. Border Patrol, among others.

The course runs from September to March meeting every other weekend during the semester and every day but Sunday during winter break. Swendsen also teaches the course with the help of guest instructors from various organizations including the FBI and CIA.

"There are 50 instructors besides myself. That is why I think this is a better program than others in the country. All this expertise is brought into the classroom," Swendsen said.

The course includes First Responder certification in first aid, Cardio-Pulmonary Resuscitation and other life saving techniques. First Responders are one step below Emergency Medical Technicians. Among other topics on the course syllabus are Constitutional law, firearms training, bombs, explosives, and booby traps training, behavioral sciences and cultural awareness.

Jay Kolodzinkski, who graduated from the program this past March said, "The stuff you learn in this program is just incredible. You'll have fun learning, too. I looked forward to coming to class." Kolodzinkski graduated from UMass in September 2002 with a degree in Natural Resources and Conservation.

"I have been involved with nature since I was a little kid. But I didn't have time during the school

War running over budget; faces $4 billion shortfall

By Pauline Jelinek
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Increased violence in Iraq is pushing the cost of the war over budget, threatening a $4 billion shortfall by late summer, the top U.S. military officer said yesterday.

General Richard Myers, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said the recent decision to extend the stay of some 20,000 troops will cost roughly $700 million more over three months. The White House is keeping open the possibility it will seek additional funds before the end of this election year.

"When the service chiefs last talked about this, there was, I think, a $4 billion shortfall," Myers told the House Armed Services Committee. "We thought we could get through all of August. We'd have to figure out how to do September."

The war is costing about $4.7 billion a month, officials said. Defense officials are studying their budget, which runs through Sept. 30, to determine whether some money can be moved from purchase programs or other Pentagon accounts, Myers said.

On a day when nearly 70 people were killed by suicide bombers in Iraq's southern city of Basra, Myers and Deputy Defense Secretary Paul Wolfowitz testified for a second day on Capitol Hill. Their appearance came at one of five hearings scheduled this week to review the situation in Iraq.

American troops this month have endured the worst casualties of the year-old campaign, with 100 killed. For part of April, many lawmakers were in their districts for spring recess and heard people's concerns about Iraq.

At the hearings this week, lawmakers focused on U.S. troop strength, the transfer of power June 30 to Iraqis and extended troop deployments.

They also wanted to know what the Pentagon would do if more troops are needed; Myers said the military is working up a plan for who could go. Lawmakers hoped more foreign troops might come to Iraq; Wolfowitz said not many would while the violence continues.

Some lawmakers complained the Bush administration consistently has denied them information about Iraq over past 18 months.

Because of increased costs, Rep. Duncan Hunter, R-Calif., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said he plans to add $20 billion for the current budget year to the 2005 defense bill now being considered.

Several lawmakers complained anew that the administration's 2005 budget request for the Defense Department was sent to them with no money in it for the wars in Afghanistan or Iraq.

Suicide attack kills at least 68

By Abbas Fayadh
Associated Press

BASRA, Iraq (AP) — Suicide attackers unleashed car bombings against police buildings in Iraq's biggest Shiite city yesterday morning, striking rush-hour crowds and killing at least 68 people, including 16 children incinerated in their school buses.

The attacks wounded about 200 people and marked a revival of devastating suicide bombings, which had not been seen during this month's battles between U.S. forces and homegrown guerrillas across Iraq.

Basra Gov. Wael Abdul-Latif, a member of the Iraqi Governing Council, blamed al-Qaida, but a U.S. counterterrorism official said it was premature to make such judgments.

In Fallujah, the bloodiest battlefield in April, an agreement aimed at bringing peace to the city ran into trouble yesterday. Insurgents attacked Marines, prompting fighting that killed 20 guerrillas. Marines said most weapons turned in by residents were unusable, undermining a crucial attempt at disarming fighters.

About 350 miles to the south, in Basra, bombers struck at 7 a.m., just as the city's main street market, near one of the targeted police stations, was opening for the day. Shoppers were headed to the stalls of vegetables and other goods, and children were passing on their way to school.

He will be heading off to work at St. Croix National Scenic River Park in Wisconsin. Peter Michaels, who graduated from the program in March 2003 works at the Minuteman National Historic Park in Concord, Mass.

"The program was great. I learned a lot of valuable information, like how to be safe on the job," Michaels said.

Students in the Conservation Law Enforcement Officer training program do not need to be enrolled at UMass. In fact, those registered in the training program do not have to be a student anywhere or posses a college degree.

RIAA continues efforts against downloading sion based on morals and self-interest.

"These people get paid to put out a product, and companies need to make revenue from it, so you should pay," Kiggans said.

On the other end of the spectrum, a UMass junior who spoke on condition of anonymity who will be referred to as Randy, shares 18,000 songs on his computer over Internet networks, and downloads an estimated two or three entire albums per week, "although sometimes I'll go on a binge and get like 10."

Although the RIAA deal "spooked" Randy and "slowed down his downloading habit for awhile," he claims he isn't worried about being sued.

The threat has modified his downloading habits, however.

"I don't think there's one song on my computer that the RIAA cares about," he said. "Mostly thanks to my esoteric taste and also thanks to the RIAA radar."

The RIAA radar is a website (riaaradar.com) that warns downloaders which albums and artists are policed by the RIAA online. Subsequently, Randy now checks first before downloading albums by big-name acts. He claims he decided not to download a Justin Timberlake album after spotting the artist's name on the RIAA radar site.

Despite the raised awareness and cautiousness of downloaders, the RIAA argues that illegal downloading continues to negatively affect CD sales worldwide and legitimate downloading services. The RIAA claims that peer-to-peer networks like Kazaa and Grokster have complete control over their services, and deprive legitimate services — like Apple iTunes, which offer songs at 99 cents per download — the opportunity to succeed.

Many computer users with less mainstream tastes argue that free file sharing allows for exposure to new and independent artists.

"Independent labels have everything to gain by allowing free exposure to the bands on their rosters," Randy said. "And if huge labels who try to push albums through hit singles are nervous because it allows people to get the honey without the sting, well, maybe they should rethink how they work the hit machine."

A total of 1,977 lawsuits have been filed since September. The 89 university network users sued in March were sharing an average of 814 songs on the Kazaa network, according to the RIAA. Civil penalties can range from $750 to $150,000 per violation, though many alleged violators have chosen to settle their cases at an average of $3,000.

in 1961, both from Wayne State University in Detroit.

In 1958, Zajicek became the first trained inorganic chemist hired by UMass.

Zajicek considered himself, above all, a professor who consistently taught two or three courses per semester.

His major accomplishments include receiving an Outstanding Teaching Award in 1992, authoring 36 professional publications and mentoring 18 graduate degree students.

For many years, Zajicek served on the Amherst Conservation Commission, and played a key role in establishing the nationally and internationally acclaimed Acid Rain Monitoring Project.

In relation to that project, in 1982 Zajicek established the ongoing Environmental Analysis Lab to support the projects of volunteer surface-water monitoring groups around the state and the region.

He leaves behind his wife, Roberta, three children, Thomas, Peter and Kristin, and two grandchildren.

His family has established a scholarship fund in honor of Zajicek. The fund is being called the "Dr. Oliver T. Zajicek Undergraduate Chemistry Scholarship Fund." Contributions can be sent to Susan Alston, director of development, College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics, University of Massachusetts, 712A LGRT, 710 N. Pleasant St., Amherst, MA 01003-9305.

Anyone wishing to attend the memorial service is asked to RSVP to Marie Whalen by phone at 413-545-2580, or by e-mail at marie@chem.umass.edu.

All are welcome to attend.

Senators debate Pledge of Allegiance of Allegiance and whether or not it should be recited during a formalized time.

Senator Olaf Aprans said that the Pledge of Allegiance is something that some people just need to get used to doing.

"There are periods in your life that you don't feel comfortable doing certain things that aren't that bad. I once was not comfortable dating," he said.

The senators "aww"-ed at this because it was announced at the SGA banquet that Aprans is engaged.

For the first time in four years, there was a tied-vote, leaving Eckel to vote on this motion. He said that he liked the informality of saying the Pledge during the announcements section of the meeting and so he voted for the motion.

The second motion passed without debate or discussion. It said that the office of Student Affairs and Campus Life should coordinate its programming better with those of registered student organizations. The motion cited that the Theater Guild holds a talent show and the Student Activities Center has a game show night, all of which the office has also programmed.

The meeting, despite some tense moments, was generally light. Brennan turned 19 years old last night and Eckel started a round of the happy birthday song for him.

Eckel also started a new policy at last night's meeting. He said he was tired of Senators interrupting each other. He offered that everyone return to kindergarten to pass the "magic ball" when it was someone's turn to speak.

Senator James Bettencourt proceeded to grab a black, flat basketball from The Massachusetts Daily Collegian office and brought it to the meeting. Brennan stood for the rest of his debate for vetoing the OAA charter, holding the basketball.

Attack kills 16 children in school bus; 200 people wounded

The attackers detonated four cars packed with missiles and TNT in front of three police stations — one of them next to Basra's main street market — and a police academy. An hour later another car bomb went off outside the police academy in Zubair, a largely Sunni town about nine miles from mainly Shiite Basra.

Police discovered two other car bombs before they were detonated and arrested three men in the vehicles, Abdul-Latif said.

The blast in front of the Saudia police station wrecked and charred vehicles, including school buses taking kindergarners and girls ages 10-15 to school.

Dead children, burned beyond recognition, were pulled from the wreckage. One body, black as carbon but apparently an adult, was taken away in a pickup truck.

Military records give Kerry campaign a newer identity

Presidential hopeful John Kerry released his military records on his campaign Web site Wednesday. The move comes after the Massachusetts Senator turned presidential hopeful was criticized for leaving the Vietnam War prematurely.

Many republicans have questioned whether or not Kerry's alleged injuries were enough to warrant an early exit from the war, and whether or not he was deserving of one of the highest honors the military gives out, The Purple Heart, on three occasions.

The 120 pages of records released do not paint a picture of a man running from public service. In fact, it is just the opposite. Kerry comes off as a courageous, honorable man fully deserving of his Purple Hearts, as well as a Bronze Star and a Silver Star, for "for gallantry and intrepidity in action."

The records do not go into great detail as to the nature of the injuries Kerry sustained while in Vietnam. They briefly describe shrapnel wounds to various parts of Kerry's body, but the extent of the injuries is not disclosed.

Kerry's former commanding officer, Lt. Cmdr. Grant Hibbard, last week told the Boston Globe that Kerry's first Purple Heart resulted from a minor wound, a "small, fingernail-sized scrape." Additionally, Kerry's campaign provided The Associated Press with declassified reports that touched briefly upon the injuries that led to Kerry's final two Purple Heart awards.

The release of Kerry's public records comes amidst democratic accusations geared towards President George Bush's failure to release personal documents, and of his lack of substantial military service.

"We are happy to compare Senator Kerry's record of service to anybody in the Bush campaign," Kerry campaign spokesman Michael Meehan said.

CNN.com reports that republicans will now "shift their attention to Teresa Heinz Kerry's tax returns, which the Kerry campaign has (so far) refused to release." It would seem more effective for republicans to satisfy some of the accusations that are directed at them before making more of their own. The biggest criticism of the Bush camp was the refusal of National Security advisor Condoleezza Rice to testify in front of a panel investigating the events leading up to Sept. 11. Rice eventually took the stand, providing nothing more than vague answers and passive commentary. By making his military records open to the public, Kerry has made a clear statement that he does not wish to hide his past from the American public.

The specifics of the records aside, this disclosure is an important step in Kerry's campaign. Republicans have criticized him for not having a well-known identity, and thus making him the "unknown candidate." Last week Kerry vowed to give himself more of an identity through his new ad campaign. While it remains to be seen if the ad campaign will have positive or negative effects in the long-term, the disclosure of military records will surely go a long way in shaping the public's opinion of Kerry.

A real real-life hospital drama

Adrienne Bossi

After watching a rerun of the popular television show "ER" the other night, I decided I ought to clear up some confusion of what life is really like in a hospital emergency room.

I work in the Patient Registration department of Caritas Good Samaritan Hospital, in Brockton, Mass., when I am at home. In the year I have been working there, I have yet to see the blood and guts and gore of "ER." I have yet to experience a full hospital quarantine due to exposure to the small pox virus. I have not been held hostage, or seen a gun on anybody in the hospital besides the security guards.

Of course there is always drama at a hospital — life is constantly being born, healed, and taken away. Yet, the drama is not nearly as Hollywood razzle-dazzle as many popular television shows, like "ER", depict. Let me paint a picture of what a typical busy shift at the hospital is really like.

A family of eight storms into the emergency waiting room asking to see their two-year old relative who was rushed by ambulance into the ER for seizures. I remember registering him; he was crying, cold, and pantless. The nurse snapped on his latex gloves to insert an anal suppository while his mother held him down as I asked her for her son's demographic information.

As this family storms in, the phone rings with a patient wishing to confirm his information for an appointment he has coming up next week. Meanwhile, my bin of walk-in patients needing their charts registered began filling up.

"Someone needs to come out here and help me," I yell to the women in the back office who are swamped themselves at the bed board trying to admit patients, open up rooms, swap rooms, and file death certificates.

A child is screaming in the corner of the waiting room because she has had a piece of candy lodged in her nose for hours now. A moment later, the ambulance phone rings alerting me that another ambulance has arrived in the ER with a new patient. I need to finish the paperwork with the patient at my desk, who cut off his thumbnail with an electric drill first. I rush into the ER and am directed to Bed Two, told to use my ears and nose to follow the trail of expletives and vodka left behind the patient. She is kicking and yelling, "You F—ers! You can't keep me here!"

The ER nurse firmly, but gently, sets her straight, "You're bleeding from the face. We are keeping you here."

"No way! You have no right! Call my lawyer!" she screeches.

"You have a choice," informs the nurse, "cooperate and we'll fix you up smoothly, or keep kicking and yelling and we'll strap you to the bed."

Of course there is always drama at a hospital — life is constantly being born, healed, and taken away. Yet, the drama is not nearly as Hollywood razzle-dazzle as many popular television shows, like "ER", depict.

She offers only a nickname to the nurse muddled within a cloud of swears. I'm supposed to butt in now and ask her "What's your social security number? Do you have health insurance?" I don't see that happening. I don't even bother. I just hope her information is already in the computer system.

I quickly finish her chart, and scurry over to another pair of emergency medical technicians that just arrived with a new patient. I peak around the curtain and jump back uncertain if I want to see anymore. She is squirming, partially nude, surrounded by a team of doctors and nurses and being prodded with masks and needles while moaning and grunting. Is she giving birth? Is she bleeding? Has she been badly injured? I don't know, and I don't particularly want to find out what lays behind that curtain, since I know for sure she isn't about to stop what she's doing and dig out her insurance cards or recite her social security number.

I thankfully discovered a coworker got her information while I was busy with the drunken swear-hound.

As I rush back to the waiting room, clipboard in hand, I glance at the crowd seated patiently and spot two twisted and pathetically unromantic teenagers making out behind the waiting room fish tank. So demure.

I grab the next paper in the bin and call the patient to my desk. A less serious case, a mom has brought her young son in with a high fever. I breeze through the paperwork. As she finishes signing the last form, she holds her stomach and exclaims, "I can't get up right now. My stomach kills, I think I'm having a contraction…" The phone rings again, a patient's chart is missing…

Multiply this by eight and a half hours, subtract a 30 minute dinner break that is often spent in the back office doing menial paperwork, along with another 15 minute break and that is a typical day at work in the Good Samaritan Patient Registration department.

Occasionally there are lulls in traffic and even days that not much happens. But if the infamous "Q" word is ever mentioned at those times, it is a sure bet that things won't stay "Q" word for long but steadily liven up and become very much the opposite of the "Q" word.

No blood and guts. No hostage situations. No small pox scares. No writhing bodies dropped on the doorstep of the waiting room. And every doctor is certainly not a tall, dark and handsome GQ model.

Goodbye to the Ugly Duckling

Paige Cram

It's the story we were all told as children, the story of the Ugly Duckling. The baby swan that was mercilessly teased because he looked different from all the baby geese. But as he got older, he began to grow into his own beauty and matured into a beautiful swan. The story taught us that everyone is beautiful in their own way and that as we grow up, we learn to accept ourselves the way we are.

Well, now America's youth is being told a different fairy tale, one of quick fixes and easy-way-out's, where the moral of the story is that what's on the outside is what really counts.

Fox's latest attempt to create a splash in the world of reality TV has warped the old tale into "The Swan," a show that makes ugly people beautiful… supposedly.

In the show, 16 women between the ages of 22 and 38 were chosen as contestants for this beauty-pageant-gone-wrong. They undergo a three-month process of intensive plastic surgery and see themselves only when it is all over. Each week the show features two of these women, and at the end of each episode, their newfound "beauty" is revealed. Then, one of them is sent home while the other has the opportunity to show off her surgery in a shameless pageant at the series' conclusion.

And what message does this send to the audience? That it's better to be "Hollywood" gorgeous than real and genuine. That if people don't find you attractive, you should strive to meet their standards, and worst of all, that if you don't feel good about yourself, changing your outer appearance will change who you are.

Sure, there are times for everyone where a haircut or a few new outfits can give you a fresh look and the confidence boost you need to work on what's really at the root of the problem. But it is never the solution, and neither is reconstructing your nose or injecting collagen into your lips.

On the Web site for "The Swan," there is a message board where dozens and dozens of teenage girls have posted pleas to audition for the next series. Most of them say that "boys don't pay attention" to them or they "just want a boyfriend." They all seem to believe that if they could just get radical plastic surgery done, it would be the solution to all of their teenage angst.

We all went through an awkward phase during adolescence; it's part of the deal. It's part of growing up, and so is learning how to deal with the awkwardness and be confident in ourselves despite what others thinks.

We all went through an awkward phase during adolescence; it's part of the deal. It's part of growing up, and so is learning how to deal with that awkwardness and be confident in ourselves despite what others think.

But today's generation of pubescent youngsters are quickly learning that they may not have to go to all the trouble of growing up. If they can just look grown-up on the outside, then that will be enough to get them by in this society.

There have been many reality shows in the past couple of years that push the limits of good taste and leave some of us disgusted with our own culture, but the disturbing thing about this show is that it is not alone. "The Swan" seems to be merely a symptom of a growing trend in this country.

MTV airs a show called "I Want a Famous Face" where participants undergo several operations in order to look more like a celebrity. Recent guests have included twin brothers who wanted to look like Brad Pitt and a female model who wanted to look like Kate Winslet. Discovery Health also frequently airs shows based on these extreme make-overs. One episode even featured mother/daughter surgery, where over the course of three days, a mother and her two daughters all had several procedures done.

The fact that plastic surgery has become a fad, or worse, an excuse for a bonding experience, is frightening. It used to be that plastic surgery was for people with severe injuries and, of course, celebrities. But now, with even cartoon shows like "Family Guy" addressing the issue, it has become commonplace and the impact of such procedures has become severely watered down.

Surgically altering your appearance is not a minor procedure, and yet today it is being treated as casually as getting contact lenses or dying your hair. And why not? After all, wouldn't it be great if every guy looked like Brad Pitt and every woman looked like Kate Winslet? Maybe what we really need is just to clone all the gorgeous celebrities and do away with everyone else. Because really, what's the point of being unique in a society that so highly values uniformity?

No love for abstract sculpture

Gilad Skolnick

Chances are you look at that sculpture by the Fine Arts Center, and you have nothing nice to say about it. You remember being told that if you have nothing nice to say then don't say anything at all but you just can't help it.

I've heard people muffle out an "ewww," squint, and even shudder, after laying their eyes upon the sculpture that stands over a dozen feet tall, nestled in the plaza right between the FAC and beautiful Herter Hall, proudly taking all of the attention.

No one really knows much about this sculpture, not even some of the most studious art majors in our "honors" college, yet this is a significant part of our very campus. I was frankly quite befuddled upon finding out that everyone knew about this sculpture but not one person in my dormitory knew its name.

How can you call yourself a proud UMassian without knowing the truth about this? Sure you can go to all of the hockey games, memorize that our Sam the Minuteman statue and our "Red Man" American Indian statue was given to us by the class of 1950. You could even know the name of each of the dormitories on campus, but until you know the truth about that sculpture, don't you dare call yourself a proud UMassian.

Some say that it's just a clunk of twisted metal forgotten in the plaza or dropped off there as an April fools prank, but no, this is no clunk I tell you. This sculpture is perhaps one of the best features of our campus, and I'm not just saying this because we have so many hideous buildings. There are many people who have used strong negative words to describe this piece of art, from the harsh word "hate" to "nauseating" and even "campus center-like" but I am afraid I must politely disagree.

This sculpture, named the Quinnipiac, is deep, moving, and serves as an inspiration to all of us. If you just open your mind, take a deep breath, and think outside the box, you'll be able to see what it's all about.

It is vibrant red, exuberates energy and is full of life, especially with its gray dull background. Red is the color of life and of love and after all, what is livelier than that?

The best way to describe Quinnipiac is as a "dialogue between two sheets of steel" as the FAC Gallery exhibit catalogue states. Its design, full of curves, straight edges, and diagonal edges, with its undulating surface, creates a changing play of light and shadow. The curves of the sculpture in front of the sharp defined lines of the FAC, makes it stand out even more.

While no one really knows exactly what it is supposed to symbolize, anyone with a few hours to spare can come up to their own conclusions pretty easily. Unlike other sculptures, this one allows creativity, as we are not told for once what to think. It is unique, and it doesn't blend in with its setting at all; it is in a sense a reflection of our own attempt to stand out and to be noticed.

No one wants to be boring, but rather everyone wants to be noticed for who he or she is. The one thing we constantly declare is that we don't just want to be some face in a crowd. After all, perhaps being your own individual while part of a large community is the spirit of UMass.

This abstract art isn't as defined or predictable as perhaps the statue of Sam the Minuteman, but the Quinnipiac allows us to think — it is a different sculpture at each angle, a different entity, as we are. It is a sculpture of us.

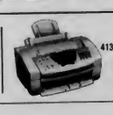
A remnant of the first exhibit of the Fine Arts Center, built in 1975, this piece of abstract art was part of the Fine Arts Center Gallery's opening exhibit "Artist and Fabricator" and thus a part of the very beginnings of our FAC.

Its very name is full of meaning, as according to Quinnipiac.edu, the word of American Indian origins was pronounced "quinnuppin-uk," which is defined as "a turning point; to make a change in the direction of travel." This is a perfectly fitting place for a sculpture that is full of turns and changes of direction, a university, a place where we all change our direction of travel.

Perhaps that is why I am most puzzled that the UMass Alumni Association's 2004 calendar had the Quinnipiac absent, as the sculpture was not present in even one of the 12 photographs, despite the fact that there were numerous photos of our library, a less than stellar masterpiece which at times has had bricks come loose and crash down into the ground from dozens of floors up. The irony is that this large sculpture was partly funded by grants from the very same Alumni Association.

On the other hand, with all of the discrimination that the Quinnipiac has had to suffer over the years, is it that surprising? How many post-cards at the UMass U-store have a picture of it? How many websites? On a UMass campus tour for incoming freshmen they don't even mention it! This is either due to a deep hatred of Canadians or due to a lack of appreciation of abstract art.

I for one am glad that the Quinnipiac has UMass Amherst as its home. I love the Minuteman, and I am very happy that the class of 1950 was generous enough to donate such a beautiful sculpture, but just as the Minuteman has its place, so does the Quinnipiac. As the Canadian-American artist of the sculpture, Robert Murray, put it, "University students are supposed to be open to new ideas; theoretically they should be a good audience for painting and sculpture."



I urge you to go visit the Quinnipiac. Touch it, be part of it, feel it, be with it, eat under it, love it. Make it a part of your every day routine, maybe even hug it. Look deep into it; perhaps you will discover something new about yourself or the world. You have been given the opportunity to think for yourself. Walk around it, see it from each angle, and let it expand your mind.

'60s caught on film

Jimi Hendrix and friend visit a Monterey, Calif. flower stand in one of the many photos taken by Elaine Mayes. All of her photos from the June 1967 Monterey International Pop Festival are included in the collection: "It Happened in Monterey."

Photographer Elaine Mayes brings Monterey to Amherst

ELAINE MAYES' "IT HAPPENED IN MONTEREY" (Britannia Press) you can see Jerry Garcia, before the 'touch of gray,' Mickey Dolenz sans Davey Jones, David Crosby and Steven Stills before Nash and Young.

Janis Joplin, Jimi Hendrix, The Grateful Dead, Buffalo Springfield, the Mamas and the Papas and The Who are all featured in Mayes' book of photographs from the 1967 Monterey International Pop Festival. Beyond the star power, though, lies the artistry of Mayes' photography. The book also features commentary from documentarian D.A. Pennebaker, Who guitarist Peter Townshend and journalists, historians and fans at the festival.

Working with simple camera setups — no flash, no lights — Mayes documented the festival from every angle she could, including atop a very gracious friend's shoulders. The mix of stage and crowd shots offers a more personal look at the festival than just the artists playing their music.

The bulk of Mayes' work is in black and white, the rest in Ektachrome — a color slide film that lends itself to a wide range of enhancements. The book is laid out in order of the three nights of music and those artists not on stage can be found in the crowd. Not only did Mayes catch artist's off-guard, she does so in a new way — one example is Jerry Garcia, peeking out in the midst of a Saturday afternoon crowd.

Surrounded by the musical prowess at Monterey, Mayes is also careful to capture the time and spirit of the decade with her crowd shots. Headbands, flowers in hair and all the accoutrements of the hippie movement show in kind as Mayes focuses her lens on sitting couples, a policeman stringing his antenna with flowers and a poster vendor — all expressing their own aspects of the 60s.

Mayes will be at Amherst Books today at 5 p.m. to discuss the book and her experience shooting the festival.

Not an 'ordinary' experience

While in Jamaica, one writer finds a fresh band

By Matthew M. Burke
Collegian Staff

Ever since I was a little kid I had dreamt of visiting Jamaica.

As I looked out the window and saw the cloud-enveloped mountains, I knew that my dreams were coming true. For years my life had been saturated by Jamaican music and culture. I had always listened to Desmond Dekker, Bob Marley, Peter Tosh, Barrington Levy, Toots and the Maytals, Sean Paul, Bounty Killer, and Beanie Man to name a few. Emulating the "Jamaican attitude" came as second nature to me, because I had always had great respect for a people who continue to enjoy life and appreciate it without regard of the troubles they face on a daily basis. This became palpable after seeing the immense poverty in Jamaica. So, while Bob Marley sang to me through my headphones, our plane

Ordinary K dazzles Spring Beak crowd

A gig at UMass is in the works for New York City-based band

swooped into Montego Bay and landed with sunshine dancing on all the faces I saw. I stepped off the plane and was immediately handed a Red Stripe. Spring Break had officially begun.

When going on Spring Break in Jamaica with five of your best friends there are numerous guarantees. First, you're going to have the best time that you will ever have in your entire life — and you will not want to leave.

You will go back to Jamaica every year for the rest of your life because it is as beautiful as you could possibly imagine. Second, you will be fluent in Jamaican talk. Phrases like "Lord-have-mercy" and "Ya mon" will spill from your mouth like it came as naturally as breathing. Instead of saying goodbye to someone, you will replace it simply with "respect." Third, Red Stripe and Appleton Rum will taste like water. If it were safe to bathe in the two, you'd probably do it. You will also come back to the States and feel as though every price is negotiable on anything from food to a taxi, which will really annoy the local vendors. Lastly, the best band you will see down in Jamaica will be from New York City?

I did not think that it would be possible to visit Jamaica and come away convinced that a band I saw from New York City was the highlight of my trip. I mean, I saw Elephant Man and Beanie Man live while I walked up and down the beaches of Negril, but it was at Jimmy Buffet's Margaritaville that I saw Ordinary K, and I was sold. Ordinary K, whose name derives from one of David Letterman's top ten bad cereal names, is one of the best bands out there. They met in Boulder, Colo., and recently moved east to find a bigger fan base. Sponsored by Budweiser, and chosen to perform for MTV's Spring Break in Negril for three weeks, they are guaranteed to be a household name very soon. Ordinary K was so good that my friends and I went up to them after the show, and had to say thank you. We were all rewarded with a CD from guitarist James Steube that subsequently has not left my stereo yet.

"Playing in Jamaica was intense," said drummer Jeremy Bretey. "I feel like musically we owed the people a lot (due to the poverty and how hard the people worked). It was truly a spiritual experience."

Ordinary K consists of Todd "Woody" Woodward on the mic, James

Steube on guitar, Jeremy Bretey on drums, James Bruner on bass guitar, and

James Walton on the keyboard. It's hard to describe Ordinary K's style because any kind of music known is in some way, even if small, incorporated into what has become their own. They have been compared to 311 and Sublime but they shake off such comparisons. Whether it be rap, rock, reggae, funk, soul, or even jazz, Ordinary K has a little bit of everything that will leave you bobbing your head and wanting to hear more.

Renowned for their energetic live performances, Ordinary K has been touring the country conquering it as they go. With one album, "Side by Each," receiving critical acclaim, and another album soon to be released, a mainstream breakthrough is on the horizon.

They have shared the stage with such acts as Rahzel, Blackalicious, Doug E. Fresh, Ozomotli, Soulive, and DJ Logic, and they do not intend on slowing down now.

"We'd love to come play at UMass-Amherst!" said Woodward with a smile. "I'm from Mass so it'd be great."

> "We'd love to come play at UMass-Amherst! I'm from Mass so it'd be great."
> - Ordinary K lead singer Todd "Woody" Woodward

A trip to UMass is in the works and it is truly a show that cannot be missed by anyone who enjoys a masterfully slammin' live performance.

Less than two weeks ago Ordinary K was at Common Ground in Boston. I couldn't resist making the trip to the hub to see them. I got a sleazy hotel room in Watertown and went to the bar three hours prior to the show.

As I walked up to the bar I saw Woody standing outside. I re-introduced myself and we went off into a long conversation about how incredible Jamaica was.

Woody introduced me to his father, who had made the trip all the way from Cape Cod to see his son play. As the bar filled up with people, some wearing Ordinary K t-shirts, I spoke with the other members of the band trying to, in some small way, learn what had made them my favorite band almost overnight. When they started playing I had my answer.

They played their songs for three hours, taking only a small break in between. The highlight of the set was "Honey Sweet," which would most likely be the number one single off of "Side by Each." They played other favorites "Lay it Down," "Question Mark's," and my personal favorite "Burnin' Down the House" (a Talking Heads cover).

"We just got back from a tour of Jamaica, where we met our friend Matt who came all the way from UMass to be here tonight. We just wanted to say one thing to him that nobody in here besides him will understand.

"Two dirty dirty quatro!" shouted Woody at one point as they broke into a song. At this juncture I closed my eyes and I really felt like I was back on the beaches of Negril, listening to Ordinary K, and drinking a Red Stripe. Two dirty dirty quatro had been the rallying cry of Spring Break Negril.

When I was in Jamaica, nobody stood still during Ordinary K. Everyone danced and had a blast. By the second day everyone knew the words to their songs. I was kind of shocked, when after the first song played in Boston, nobody moved. Ordinary K didn't seem to notice and rocked the place with passion and soul. By the time the third song started, the whole place had crowded around the stage and had erupted into dancing, one more crowd conquered.

"We love playing in Boston," said Bretey. "Woody is from here, and in NYC people don't let go. They just stand around." This is certainly not the case in Boston as I saw a girl try and rip Woody's shirt off after their set.

So, as all good things must come to an end, the show was over. As I walked out of the bar I stopped and turned around to re-enter. I went up to the smiling band and thanked them one more time for making the party happen.

Q: I broke up with my boyfriend of five years last week, and for some reason I feel fine. We had the best relationship ever, but I want to see new people now. I haven't even cried yet, and I am already out and having fun. Is there something wrong with me? I feel so guilty for not grieving. –H.L.

A: Well, consider yourself lucky. It is a little strange you don't feel even a little sadness or loss, but maybe you are just stronger than some of us. Or maybe you are desensitized to human feelings. But it could be possible that you fell out of love a long time ago. And since he was around during this period, you became more comfortable with your decision as time went on. All I can say is never look back regretfully, and enjoy your newly discovered life!

Original Sin

Eve

His friends call him The Kid. Only until three days ago do I realize why…

We met one afternoon in October. He served me drinks at my favorite bar, and suddenly we were exclusive by the time I paid the bill. And then he told me his nickname. Why didn't I get the hint?

My friends seemed concerned about my new beau. I had come out of an emotionally exhausting relationship a month before, and even I had agreed it was time for a break. But my ambivalence with The Kid only made him more persistent in getting me to commit. He introduced me as his girlfriend the next day, and my stomach churned. He told me he loved me by the second week, and all I could do was thank him. And within a month, I was offered a spare key to his apartment and I received it uneasily. But isn't this what I had always wanted from my ex? Maybe The Kid is the real deal? Then again, why is he moving so fast?

By the second month, we were food shopping, cooking dinners, and enjoying nightly sleepovers in our apartment. And our apartment became a dreaded territory for his roommates. And soon enough, our apartment became an even more dreaded territory for me. I noticed how ridiculously fast this relationship had moved by glancing objectively around his room. Not only were we sharing a bed, a dresser, a night table, and a bookshelf, but even my two turtle pets were comfortably situated by his window. He loved them as if they were our children. That's what he said. Little did he know, my ex had just bought them for me on my birthday. But I let The Kid pretend they were ours. I couldn't crush his dream yet. But then the unthinkable happened. The holiday season was just around the corner, and I had no idea what to get him. And he had no idea what to get me.

I cringed when I saw the small, white box wrapped in a gold ribbon, waiting for me on our bed. And the only thing I could do was hope it was a necklace. But I knew it wasn't. The Kid bought me a white gold diamond ring.

"It's a promise ring. I think it suits you perfectly." Guess again. I did accept the gift gratefully, but we both seemed to realize the severity of the situation. And the gift. He broke up with me the next day. I wasn't surprised.

He has called to see me numerous times since his decision, and I always agree. And we always end up together for the night. But he doesn't always call me again, until he does. Only later did I notice his inconsistencies, and my unstable emotions on the matter. He seemed to call the moment after I would move on with another. Or when I finally erase his phone number from my memory. Or when I really understand that he really is The Kid. And three days ago he text messaged me at night to say hi. And all I could do was reply … goodbye.

A new Dancehall Queen is crowned

Tanya Stephens strays from the weary reggae female cliché

In this so-called dancehall reggae/hip-hop fusion we have on our hands, the music journalist is quick to make analogies.

Sean Paul is donned the Nelly of dancehall, while Elephant Man is the Busta Rhymes and Wayne Wonder is the Usher.

But with all these Jamaican artists emerging to pop-level status, there is one question to ask: Where the ladies at?

While Beyonce, Missy and Alicia keepsake their First Ladies of Hip-hop status, where are their First Lady of Dancehall counterparts?

It's a tough find. You have Lady Saw and of Patra but, it's hard pressed after that. With all the explicit sexual images of women in dancehall, the ladies struggle to find a place to showcase their deejaying skills.

But when given the opportunity — such as VP records artist Tanya Stephens has — it proves that the female deejays are no First Ladies of Dancehall. They go further than that — they are Dancehall Queens.

"To be considered half as a good as a man, a woman has to work twice as hard and me work 100 times as hard and they still give me half of that they give a guy," Stephens tells the listener in the introduction to her "Gangsta Blues" — her first release since VP merged with record tycoon Atlantic records last year.

Stephens, who debuted in 1996 with "Too Hype," drops a bluesy, classic R&B sound in her chosen riddims and written lyrics. The beats, slower and similar to roots, mimic the original dancehall sound from the mid-1980s.

"Tek Him Back" and the anthem "It's a Pity" show an appreciation of the vintage format in dancehall — a sound system and deejay. Riddims are borrowed but there is nothing like "Coolie Skank," heard on almost every dancehall album release this year.

The 17-track "Gangsta Blues" disc proves dancehall doesn't always have to be club-ready to be good.

But that doesn't mean this queen can't make us dance.

— Glen Straub

Tanya Stephens' new release "Gangsta Blues" demonstrates that dancehall reggae can stick to its original formula and still be popular in the mainstream.

An in-depth examination of this weekend's NFL Draft

team has too many holes for a young quarterback to fix, and the organization is actually terrified of wasting another high pick. Their best bet would be to trade down a few spots to add some more picks.

4.) The Maurice Clarett/Mike Williams situation will never end. Well, it will, but this controversy is more annoying and possibly more complicated than the presidential election in 2000.

Williams is not at fault here, but the NFL and seemingly the rest of the football world has a genuine dislike towards Clarett and his decision to challenge every ruling imposed against him. If he ever does make his way into the NFL, expect him to carry his own, personal, red challenge flag for every time he touches the ball.

5.) Steven Jackson has the most unique draft status this weekend. He could be taken anytime between the second and twenty-second overall picks. Oakland needs a running back as much as they need anything, and Al Davis is unpredictable enough to take Jackson at number two.

He is one of the ten best players in the draft, and he could have more of an impact on a team than any of the big-name wide receivers. He played at a low-profile Oregon State school, which considerably limited his national exposure, and teams may not want to take him with such a high pick.

There is no chance he will slip past Dallas, though, who is looking for a back in the first round.

Every year, there are several players who are overlooked and slip later in the first and second round than they should. Last season's rookie of the year, Anquan Boldin, was selected at the fifty-fourth overall pick in the second round and Clinton Portis was the fifty-first overall pick in the second round a year before that.

Here are four players who are underrated for various reasons and will be a steal when they are selected on Saturday.

Philip Rivers. Try being a quarterback in the same draft as anyone with the last name Manning. The North Carolina State signal caller scares scouts with his awkward throwing style, but his arm strength and accuracy are as good as anyone. He had a remarkable career for the Wolfpack, capitalized by a tremendous Senior Bowl, and could turn out to be the best quarterback in the draft.

-Roy Williams. OK, I understand he will be a top-10 pick, but he would have been last year, too. America fell in love with Larry Fitzgerald because he played for a team without much recognition with nothing but class. Williams will be a better pro earlier than Fitzgerald because of his speed and ability to make athletic catches in and around the end zone.

-Ben Troupe. Troupe has no chance of getting respect in this draft, solely because of Kellen Winslow. Winslow played for Miami while Troupe played at Florida. Winslow comes from a football family, and he is much more vocal than Troupe. Troupe's only chance of going early would be to Denver at the seventeenth pick, but he could slip all the way to the second round.

-Matt Ware. The UCLA defensive back can play safety or cornerback, but he is overshadowed by Sean Taylor. Playing at UCLA doesn't usually help draft status, either. If the Patriots don't make a move for Taylor, Ware will be a great fit for Belichick because of his love for versatile defensive players and eagerness to replace Ty Law.

-DeAngelo Hall. The cornerback from Virginia Tech is in the same boat as Roy Williams. He is amazingly fast. The Hokies track team reportedly clocked Hall with a 4.15 second 40 last summer. He can cover wide receivers a lot tighter than he is given credit for and will be a phenomenal kick returner. Detroit could take him as high as six if Taylor is unavailable, but he is more likely to be a mid first round steal.

Last weekend was one of the most interesting and entertaining sports weekends of recent memory. Athletes were getting arrested, the Sox took three of four from the Yankees, and as soon as the Boston Marathon ended, the Patriots traded for Corey Dillon. All of these things overshadowed the Bruins predictable self-destruction.

This weekend has the chance to be every bit as, if not more successful with the Sox traveling to the Bronx for a three-game set during the same time Scott Pioli and Belichick are in the war room improving the Patriots chances of repeating as champions.

If all else fails, the draft will be at least more exciting than the Celtics getting swept by the Pacers.

Clarett takes case to Supreme Court

By Rusty Miller
Associated Press

Associated Press

Maurice Clarett hopes to be cleared to enter Saturday's draft.

COLUMBUS, Ohio — Maurice Clarett's status for the NFL draft is now in the hands of the U.S. Supreme Court.

Clarett's attorney, Alan Milstein, filed an emergency appeal to the Supreme Court on Tuesday. He asked for a stay of a federal appeals court's decision from 24 hours earlier preventing the former Ohio State tailback from being in this weekend's draft.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg will handle the case. She asked the NFL on Wednesday to file a response to Clarett's appeal by Thursday morning. There was no word on when she planned to act on Clarett's emergency request or whether she would refer the request to the other eight justices.

In 1971, lawyers for Detroit high school star Spencer Haywood followed the same approach. A stay preventing Haywood from going in the NBA draft was tossed out by Justice William O. Douglas, opening the door for underclassmen and teenagers to play pro basketball.

"It's the exact same scenario," Milstein said in a telephone interview with The Associated Press. "It just needs to play out the same."

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals issued the stay on Monday, putting a hold on a lower-court ruling that said the NFL can't force players to wait three years after high school before turning pro.

The NFL said the appellate decision will ultimately stand.

"There was ample support for the ruling of the 2nd Circuit, which thoroughly considered and completely rejected the arguments that Mr. Clarett's lawyers have presented to the Supreme Court," NFL executive vice president Jeff Pash said.

Southern California sophomore receiver Mike Williams filed his own lawsuit in federal court in Manhattan on Monday, saying the NFL issued conflicting statements about eligibility for the draft, which caused him to sacrifice his college career.

If they wind up being eligible, Williams would be expected to go in the first round of the draft, while Clarett might not be taken until the second or third round.

, Clarett argued in Tuesday's filing that the NFL wouldn't suffer any harm if he's allowed in the draft — but he would be harmed if he is blocked.

Clarett led Ohio State to a national title as a freshman, but was ruled ineligible as a sophomore for accepting money from a family friend and lying about it to NCAA and university investigators. Williams declared for the draft after a lower court ruled in Clarett's favor.

Clarett, 20 and out of high school two years, would be eligible for the draft next year under the current rule. He dropped out of classes at Ohio State after the winter quarter.

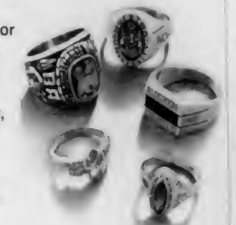
U.S. District Court Judge Shira Scheindlin ruled in February that Clarett should be allowed in the draft. She said the rule excluding him violates antitrust law and unjustly blocks a player from pursuing his livelihood.

Ginsburg is a Clinton administration appointee who oversees matters from the New York-based 2nd U.S. Circuit.

There is no court deadline for Ginsburg to act on the request, but Clarett's lawyer said if no decision is rendered before the draft Clarett "will suffer substantial irreparable injury."

If Ginsburg or the full court turns down the request, the lower court's decision against Clarett stands.

Should the court decide against Clarett — and by extension, Williams — the players could only return to play football if they met academic standards and their universities successfully petitioned the NCAA for reinstatement.



Steve Snapp, an assistant athletic director at Ohio State, said there were significant obstacles in the way of Clarett regaining his eligibility even if he wanted to rejoin the Buckeyes.

"There is a number of issues about whether or not he has professionalized himself," Snapp said. The NFL also could be compelled legally to include Clarett and Williams in a supplemental draft. Former stars such as Reggie White, Cris Carter and Bernie Kosar entered the NFL after being taken in supplemental drafts.

The long road back

Drown enjoying success after knee injury ended '03 season

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

It has been a very difficult season to this point for the UMass Minutewomen lacrosse team (3-9, 1-3 A-10), but through it all, a star has emerged on the turf at Garber Field.

Tracey Drown, a senior tri-captain from Nashua, N.H., has been playing outstanding lacrosse amidst a setback a year ago that has been known to end some athletes' careers.

Drown scored 16 goals as a freshman at Towson University.

Drown tore her medial collateral ligament two minutes into the team's fifth game last season, a victory over the University of New Hampshire. She was unable to medically red shirt because National Collegiate Athletic Association rules only allow athletes to participate in four games, meaning Drown missed the deadline by mere seconds.

During this time last year, she was in the middle of her three and a half month rehab process.

"It was really frustrating, but the coaches made it easier for me by keeping me involved with the team," said Drown.

In an era when injured athletes don't even show up to support their teams during games, Drown was helping out everyday at practice. Head coach Carrie Bolduc referred to Drown's presence as having an extra coach.

"I helped Carrie with the attack. I talked to the girls to tell them what I would have done in that situation. It helped because it's different to hear another player's point of view," said Drown, who gained a positive experience out of the situation. "I learned that I want to be a coach when I'm done playing," said Drown.

Last season started off promising for Drown. She scored seven goals in four games, providing solid depth for an experienced team that had an explosive offense.

She acknowledged that was the most disappointing part of her injury. "We had eight seniors who started, and I wanted to be with the team because I knew we were going to be successful," said Drown.

Bolduc anticipated Drown to contribute last year exactly the way she has so far this season. "I expected her to perform like she has this year. We would have been even stronger (with her in the lineup). My expectations are always high with Tracy because I know she can handle it," said Bolduc, who is in her second year as head coach.

The injury was a brand new experience for Drown, but she was poised for a successful comeback.

"This was the first injury I've ever had. It made me stronger emotionally and physically. I was able to get my legs stronger than I would have through rehab," said Drown.

Success on the lacrosse field, however, was old hat for Tracey. She was a four-year letter winner at Nashua High School where she holds the school's all-time records for goals scored and total points. She was first team All-State in 1998, 1999 and 2000. As a senior in 2000, she was an All-American and the New Hampshire Attack Player of the Year.

Drown currently leads UMass in total points and assists in 2004.

The Boston Globe named her the New Hampshire Player of the Year, among a long list of countless other awards.

Drown went to Towson University, where she scored 16 goals as a freshman and was the second leading scorer on the team. But something just wasn't right at Towson.

"I was homesick and was unhappy with the program there. UMass was a school I looked at when I was a senior in high school. It was a great fit," said Drown.

Through 12 games this season, Drown is leading the team in total points (44) and assists (15), and she is second in goals scored (29), including a six goal and two assist performance during the team's 20-14 loss against Temple on Sunday.

Drown and the Minutewomen will be back in action this weekend during a two game conference road trip. They will play St. Joseph's on Friday and LaSalle on Sunday, two must-win games for the team to stay in contention for a bid in the Atlantic 10 tournament.

"We need to forget about everything we have or haven't done. Our team is so talented," said Drown.

Bolduc is certain that Tracey will be ready to play, and she will be a target for the opposing defenses.

"She possesses so many great qualities like her attitude and consistency in games and practices. You can always depend on Tracey on or off the field. She has been dynamic this year as a leader and with her stats. She saw the game with a different perspective (last year). Sitting out made her a better player," said Bolduc.

Patriots sign veteran Burris

FOXBORO — Free agent cornerback Jeff Burris signed a one-year contract with New England amid the Patriots' salary dispute with All-Pro Ty Law.

Burris played with the Cincinnati Bengals last season, starting eight games. The Bengals cut him in March.

He twice had to leave games after concussions and was inactive for three games. He finished the year with 44 tackles and two interceptions.

The move Tuesday came a day after the Patriots acquired All-Pro running back Corey Dillon from the Bengals for a second-round draft choice.

It also comes within a week of Law's arrest in Miami Beach, Fla., in which he was accused of trying to flee from police after a traffic stop. The cornerback was charged with failure to obey a police officer and resisting an officer, both misdemeanors.

Law has asked to be traded, citing "irreconcilable differences" following a contract extension offer from the team that he considered an insult.

Law is under contract with New England for two more years. The team offered a four-year extension with a $6.6 million bonus, but Law said his conversations with coach Bill Belichick led him to believe he could get a six- to seven-year extension with a $15 million bonus.

On Tuesday, Patriots owner Robert Kraft called Law "one of my favorite players" and said he hoped Law would be with the team next season.

Former Celtics coach O'Brien eager to work with Iverson

By Dan Gelston
Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — Jim O'Brien wanted to coach the Philadelphia 76ers — and Allen Iverson.

"When you're dealing with somebody like Allen, I really want to be as close to 100-percent sure as I possibly could that I'd be coaching him," O'Brien said.

O'Brien got his wish, and the Sixers have their new coach.

Sixers president Billy King reiterated Wednesday that he will not try to trade Iverson, a former league MVP and scoring champion who is signed through 2008-09.

"Allen will be here next year," King said.

So will O'Brien, the former Boston Celtics coach who was introduced Wednesday. He is Philadelphia's 20th head coach and the third to lead the 76ers since Hall of Famer Larry Brown stepped down last May. Brown, who spent six seasons in Philadelphia, is the coach of the Detroit Pistons.

King picked assistant Randy Ayers as Brown's successor, but he was fired 52 games into the season. Ayers was replaced by Chris Ford.

The Sixers missed the playoffs for the first time since the 1997-98 season. Ford will remain in the organization.

Iverson had several run-ins with Ford, most notably refusing to come off the bench after being taken out of the starting lineup. Iverson also had a contentious relationship with Brown, but the two worked together despite several disputes.

O'Brien figures he'll have more success getting along with Iverson than his predecessors.

"I have never had difficulty leading people and having people understand the expectations that I have," O'Brien said. "I'm a fairly easy person to play for."

O'Brien, who said he had a brief and amicable conversation with Iverson on Wednesday, said whatever problems the All-Star had with previous coaches and management would stay in the past. He was comfortable that any residual issues were resolved while talking with King.

"We had open discussions about everything that happened last year," O'Brien said. "I'm satisfied that was then, and the future is the future. Clearly, what happened last year did not scare me from wanting to lead this team into next season."

Veterans Derrick Coleman, Glenn Robinson, Eric Snow and Aaron McKie might be made available through trades or the expansion draft.

O'Brien expects the Sixers to reach the playoffs as long as they remain healthy.

King said O'Brien was always his first choice, and that he did not meet with any other potential candidates. King said he never asked Portland for permission to talk with coach Maurice Cheeks, a former Sixers' star.

King first met with O'Brien on March 25 in Boston and finalized the deal Monday, not wanting other teams to call O'Brien after the playoffs. O'Brien wanted to return to Philadelphia — not that he was waiting for the only other team with an interim coach to come calling.

"Boston didn't want to hire me," he said, joking.

O'Brien stepped down as coach of the Celtics on Jan. 27, midway through his fourth season with the team after clashing with Danny Ainge, Boston's executive director of basketball operations.

Ainge wanted to build a younger, more offensive team. O'Brien relied on veterans who were strong defenders.

Red Sox trade for lefty Thomas

The risk is low, and the potential reward is "off the charts."

That's what Boston manager Terry Francona says about lefty Brad Thomas, acquired Wednesday in a trade with the Minnesota Twins.

The Sox picked up the 26-year-old Thomas in exchange for a player to be named or cash considerations.

But Thomas "has got some issues with his elbow," Francona said, and he'll be in Boston on Friday to be examined by doctors.

Following that, he'll likely be sent to Fort Myers to get healthy.

"It's a chance to get a look at a nice lefty," Francona said. "We think it's worth the look. The guy's got a pretty good arm."

With four lefties in his bullpen, Francona said Thomas won't be pitching in Boston anytime soon.

"He's not here to take someone's spot. We're really pleased with what these guys are doing."

A native of Sydney, Australia, Thomas was drafted by the Los Angeles Dodgers in 1995.

With triple-A Rochester last season, Thomas struck out 50 while walking only 10 in 58 2/3 innings.

An early look at the 2004 NFL Draft

Jeff Howe

If arena football hasn't cured your Super Bowl hangover by now, don't check further into more water, Advil or even Madden 2004. This coming weekend will chase your hangover away faster than the Miami Police Department can say "Ty Law."

The National Football League draft, the most exciting event in football's off season, is creeping up quickly; not quick enough for the die hard fans, but much quicker than Maurice Clarett and Mike Williams were hoping.

There is so much more to watching the draft than just hearing the prospects' names being called. The results of each pick are either entirely conventional or completely out of left field. There is rarely any middle ground.

Last season, the Buffalo Bills went into draft day short of a playmaking receiver any semblance of an offensive line, two things Drew Bledsoe needed more of than a stretcher after his "meeting" with Mo Lewis three years ago.

Instead, they drafted Willis McGahee, a running back who was a little more than three months removed from the second most horrifying knee injury ever seen on national television, only because his leg didn't break completely in half the way Joe Theisman's did.

Their running back, Travis Henry, just had a breakthrough season and appeared to be Buffalo's running back of the future. If playing in a notoriously cold city wasn't enough reason not to draft McGahee, the artificial turf they needed to rip up and replace to be more knee-friendly should have been.

When the Minnesota Vikings missed their first round fifteen-minute deadline for the second year in a row, it appeared that they were destined to be the laughing-stock of the league for the next decade of draft weekends. Luckily for them, the man they ended up selecting, defensive tackle Kevin Williams, had a stellar rookie season.

Don't put it past head coach Mike Tice to miss another deadline, though. Vegas should run odds on this.

Here are some other things you should know about this weekend.

1.) This draft is extremely deep at just about every position. There are nine wide receivers with first round talent. This draft class has the potential to have the most talent in the first two rounds than any previous draft, resulting in even more league parity.

2.) There is always talk of about a dozen big draft day trades, but rarely do any blockbusters actually happen. This year's draft order has a recipe for wheeling and dealing, though.

Look for San Diego and Arizona to trade down because both teams are too porous to satisfy their team needs with their respective picks.

Oakland can afford to trade down because they aren't as bad as most teams with the second worst record usually are, and owner Al Davis is conniving enough to trade down a few spots in order to pick up an extra pick.

The Patriots are too close to the salary cap to be able to afford two first round picks next year, and Bill Belichick is too efficient to risk more cap problems.

3.) The San Diego Chargers will blow yet another first round pick. This is as automatic as things come in the NFL. Ryan Leaf was their first disaster, and although LaDainian Tomlinson is one of the best running backs in the league right now, Mike Vick can single-handedly win football games, something the Chargers can't do without him now.

Eli Manning will be a very solid quarterback, but he won't be as productive as the Chargers will need him to be right away. Their

New fundraiser unveiled

Chancellor John V. Lombardi speaks yesterday at a Faculty Senate meeting, announcing his new plan to raise money for the University.

By Julie O'Donnell
Collegian Staff

Chancellor John V. Lombardi exposed a major new campaign yesterday to the Faculty Senate where he asked for faculty members' help to raise money to improve the quality of the University of Massachusetts.

The campaign that is yet to be named is a timely project that will hopefully improve all aspects of the campus, according to Lombardi.

"We want to identify the goals and prospects of each college," Lombardi said, "and ask what motivates people to make major gifts so we can transform the campus to make it a higher competitive level."

Although a team of development officers has been hired to go out and recruit potential donors, Lombardi is turning to the faculty members to get an understanding of what is really important in accomplishing.

"Almost always, the faculty members drive key design products to make the institution better and more competitive," he said. "The faculty helps us identify what we need for money and to make the requests reasonable."

One area of concern is that donors want to give a gift to something very specific that is not entirely reasonable or needed. In cases like these, Lombardi hopes that the development officers can reason with the donors and make them see the importance of donating to other areas of campus.

"We must pursue the donors, but they are not the domain, the University can't become what donor agencies want it to become," he said.

Lombardi also mentioned that there are easy things to receive donations for. For example, he said that if the Old Chapel were proposed to be reconstructed, then it would be easy to ask specific people for donations, because it is something that they can see happening. However, he said that it is the things that you cannot see as easily that are going to be more difficult to raise money for.

"It is hard to tell donors what it will take to make the chemistry department better, or the history department — it's not so obvious," he said.

Typically, campaigns similar to this one, take approximately five years to complete. Lombardi guesses that if the campaign begins in late 2004, then completion would be in about seven years to make it more sustained.

"We want a campaign program that we can use for a template when we send our recruiters around the world," he said, "the donors want to have confidence that we will produce what we say we're going to produce."

He is pleased with the progress thus far mentioning that "everything is on track and the response has been good, and there is a lot of

Concrete canoes compete

By Nate Walsh
Collegian Staff

Seventeen University of Massachusetts civil engineering students are ready to paddle their way to victory in concrete canoes in Hartford this weekend.

Students from the UMass civil engineering department, working with the American Society of Civil Engineers, will be taking on regional schools in the National Concrete Canoe Competition that will feature a race at 10 a.m. on Sunday in Batterson Park in Farmington, Conn.

"The hardest part is telling people that concrete floats," said Andy Jeffrey, a junior civil engineering student and team captain. "You go into a hardware store to buy materials and people ask you 'what do you need that for?' and you have to explain to them that concrete floats."

Sunday's events will face the team with a total of five races. They will include men's and women's, two-person, 200-meter sprints; the 600-meter men's and women's endurance heat; and a coed heat which will force the canoe to carry four people at once. The teams will not only have to worry about the actual race but will also have to perform well on an academic paper and technical presentations during the events on Saturday.

The UMass team came in third place last year despite the fact that the canoe broke during competition.

"We had some problems last year but we definitely learned from them this year," said Ammie Rogers, a junior civil engineering student and vice president of the ASCE. "If anything, I think we over-engineered it," said Rogers.

"They made it more difficult by adding sand to the mix," said Jeffrey about this year's rule changes. The UMass team is responsible for coming up with its own mixture of concrete for the canoe. The UMass team has had to work its way through 47 explicit pages of rules in order to construct a canoe comprised of a mix of concrete, sand and ash. The key ingredient is microscopic glass spheres that hold in air and cause the buoyancy of the canoe.

If the team wins this regional competition, it would be able to participate in the national competition in June.

A University of Massachusetts graduate returned yesterday to sign books and to conduct a seminar with students about her success in starting her own business.

Mary Lou Andre graduated from UMass in 1986 with a major in journalism and a concentration in fashion marketing. Her book, "Ready to Wear, An Expert's Guide to Choosing and Using Your Wardrobe" was released March 1. Students came to the UStore to get copies of their books signed.

Andre conducted a seminar called "The Art of Self-Marketing" for a group of interested students. In her presentation, she told students her own tale of successful entrepreneurship. She also gave students tips about what it took to make her business successful.

Andre stressed the importance of mentors to success. She used several examples from her own

Trains collide, explode

By Sang-Hun Choe

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) — Two fuel trains collided at a North Korean railroad station near the Chinese border Thursday, igniting a deafening explosion that rained debris for more than 10 miles around, South Korean media said. As many as 3,000 people might have been killed or injured, according to the reports.

The secretive communist government in Pyongyang declared an emergency in the area while cutting off international telephone lines to prevent details of the crash from leaking out, South Korea's Yonhap news agency reported. The North's official KCNA news agency still had not mentioned the disaster by Friday morning, more than 20 hours after the blast.

South Korea's Defense Ministry confirmed Friday that there was an explosion at Ryongchon, a town 12 miles from China, but could not provide further details. "All we know is that there was a large explosion," a Haitian rebel leader surrenders to U.S.

By Michelle Faul
Associated Press

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti (AP) — Proclaiming his innocence, a rebel commander convicted of killing supporters of ousted President Jean-Bertrand Aristide surrendered to justice officials yesterday.

Louis-Jodel Chamblain's surrender came as a conference for international donors opened in Port-au-Prince. Haiti's government hopes to get millions of dollars in aid to rebuild the shattered country, which is reeling from a revolt that ousted Aristide on Feb. 29.

To a few cheers from a curious crowd, Chamblain said his conviction in absentia in 2000 was politically motivated and predicted he would be vindicated. Under Haitian law, those convicted in absentia are entitled to another trial when they return to the country.

Chamblain was accompanied by Haiti's interim Justice Minister Bernard Gousse, who called the surrender a "noble decision."

Chamblain denied the country's U.S.-backed interim government pressured him to surrender.

"I am ready to give myself up as a prisoner — to give Haiti a chance so we can build this democracy I have been fighting for," said Chamblain.

It was unclear when Chamblain would go before a judge.

Human rights groups have criticized the government for forming alliances with known criminals, like Chamblain, while it persecutes Aristide supporters.

But some Haitian human rights activists said Thursday that liberation often comes at a cost.

"We Haitians don't get to choose our heroes," said human rights activist and former Culture Minister Claude Bajeux. "The international community ... doesn't understand why (Haitian) people were so happy to see the rebels come, even if they include criminals."

Chamblain could be pardoned by Haiti's president or a national assembly, a possibility that worries

Marines warn guerrillas of repercussions

By Lourdes Navarro

FALLUJAH, Iraq (AP) — U.S. Marines warned guerrillas in this violence-wracked city yesterday that they have only days to hand over their heavy weapons or face a possible American attack. So far the insurgents have turned in mainly dud rockets, rusty mortar shells and grenades labeled "inert."

Lt. Gen. James Conway said the battle could be "costly" if Marines launch a new assault to uproot insurgents from Fallujah, saying foreign fighters in the city have been reinforcing their positions and have no interest in surrendering.

The stark warning came two days after city leaders called on insurgents to hand over their heavy weapons in return for a U.S. pledge to hold back on plans to storm Fallujah and allow the return of families that fled the city.

Now Marines have halted the return of families because of the failure to disarm and the desire to have fewer civilians in the city if fighting resumes. More than a third of Fallujah's 200,000 people fled to Baghdad and elsewhere during the fighting that began April 5.

Early Thursday, Marines launched a major assault on the village of Karma, 10 miles northeast of Fallujah, in a second attempt to put down guerrillas there. "The enemy is taking casualties; we are not," Maj. Gen. James N. Mattis said.

A battle in the village last week killed 100 insurgents, according to Marine commanders. The two days of fighting in palm groves and over canals was so intense that wounded Marines were sent out to fight.

In Baghdad, masked gunmen shot and killed a South African security contractor working for the U.S.-led occupation administration and severely wounded his translator Thursday, a U.S. spokesman said. The shooting took place near northern Baghdad's Sunni Muslim neighborhood of Azamiyah, where gunmen have been active.

The violence across Iraq has interrupted some infrastructure repairs and forced giant firms ministry spokesman said on condition of anonymity.

The North Korean leader, Kim Jong Il, had quietly passed by rail through the station as he returned from China before dawn some nine hours earlier. It was not clear what caused the crash, or if it was related to Kim's journey.

But a South Korean official, quoted on condition of anonymity by South Korea's all-news cable channel, YTN, said it appeared to be an accident.

The collision reportedly took place about 1 p.m. One train was carrying oil and the second had liquefied petroleum gas, media reported.

"The area around Ryongchon station has turned into ruins as if it were bombarded," Yonhap quoted witnesses as saying. "Debris from the explosion soared high into the sky and drifted to Sinuiju," a North Korean town on the border with China, it said.

Cho Sung-dae, a Yonhap correspondent in Beijing, said his reports were based on residents in the Chinese border city of Dandong who talked with their relatives in Ryongchon.

They described a massive explosion involving a large number of casualties but could not give figures, Cho told The Associated Press. Cho also said North Korean authorities appeared to shut down the border with China after the incident.

Subsequent attempts by his Chinese sources to contact people in Ryongchon failed because the phone lines apparently had been severed.

YTN and Yonhap reported that the number killed or injured could reach 3,000. Both organizations said their casualty counts came from South Korean government sources, whom they declined to further identify.

A South Korean Defense Ministry official confirmed "a large explosion near Ryongchon station," Yonhap reported. "We have yet to find out the cause of the incident, the kind of explosion and how many died," the official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The Chancellor also plans to have a series of kick-off events, beginning with one major event. He wants to have a dinner at the Mullins Center where the focus will be on the faculty and students. He said then there will be a "frenzy of generosity," and he wants donors to feel like, "we're part of something special — I want to join."

As for the answer to skepticism about raising enough money to make these changes, Lombardi said that he has been getting support with the President's Office and Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney, and is considering matching funds with the legislation. Lombardi reiterated that he is confident about the campaign and that it is, "practical, inspiring, exciting and real, and I guarantee you it will happen."

In addition to Lombardi's speech, SGA Speaker Jared Nokes attended the meeting where he announced that it was his first and last meeting representing SGA. He mentioned that elections are coming up and he urged faculty members to encourage students to vote.

Nokes said that there are important issues coming up, like general education requirement credits, attendance policies and minor qualification requirements.

The competition will be fierce this year, as it has been in the past, especially the University of Rhode Island, which took first place last year.

"I'm not worried about any other school," said Rogers concerning the competition. When asked about the URI team's perennial success, Rogers responded by saying "that can easily be stopped any year ... I think we can do it."

The University of Rhode Island has been very successful in the past years, as they have won the last 8 consecutive races.

According to Jeffrey, this is partially because URI offers an entire class for the production of the canoe, while UMass has made it an extra-credit project. The canoe has been made in the students' free time, which has become increasingly limited by this time of year but the UMass team is doing its best to pull through.

past mentors who had inspired or aided her. Her first mentor was a teacher from UMass whose name she can't even remember now. Later mentors included Karen Zan, who helped write Andre's business plan and lane, Meredith and Lindsay Pollock, who helped Andre to write and publish her book.

The story of Andre's business venture in the world of fashion started when she was younger.

"I always brought the neighborhood to my house to dress up for back to school."

As a sophomore in high school, Andre joined the Jordan Marsh junior fashion board. She and other board members would dress up for special events at the store and even model for Seventeen magazine.

Andre started college at Stonehill College, but came to UMass when she heard that there was a fashion marketing major here. However, the major didn't appeal to her.

"It was too retail based," said Andre, "and that was never my passion."

Andre changed her major to journalism after taking a creative writing class. She chose to keep a concentration in fashion marketing and wrote a fashion column in The Massachusetts Daily Collegian.

When Andre graduated, there was a recession and therefore few jobs were available. However, Andre still managed to find herself many "incredible" jobs before beginning her own business. She started out working as a legislative aid at the State House for Frank Woodward.

"Still," said Andre, "fashion was always with me." Andre would dress up her friends for events such as testifying before John Kerry about the war on drugs. Her work was "an incredible job experience with amazing contacts."

At the seminar Andre stressed how important these contacts had been in beginning her business.

After Andre left her job at the State House, feeling that the excitement had "dried up," she went back to work at Jordan Marsh as a freelance writer for special events. Andre worked for the senior vice-president of public affairs and dressed her up for a television interview.

It was this woman who first told Andre, "You have a business [opportunity] here."

When her work there became less abundant, Andre attempted to start that business, but had to take a job in the media department of the Children's Museum in Boston to help pay the bills while she got her wardrobe consulting business off the ground. To help pay for expenses in her fledgling business, Andre even sold her wedding dress to pay for stationary.

"I took whatever I had and turned it to gold," said Andre.

Finally Andre was able to quit her job at the museum and focus solely on her company.

"The business exploded," said Andre, "I had paying clients and I began to shop for women instead of just organizing closets."

Now Andre's business is thriving, helped along by the fashion trend inspired by "Queer Eye for the Straight Guy" and "What Not to Wear."

"It's all about following trends," said Andre, "and I've always been good at that. It's an important skill."

Chamblain fled to the neighboring Dominican Republic when a U.S. military intervention restored Aristide to power in 1994.

He returned in February to help lead the rebellion that forced Aristide to flee under pressure from the United States and France.

Chamblain, a former army sergeant, allegedly ran death squads for dictator Jean-Claude "Baby Doc" Duvalier and was a leader of the Front for the Advancement of Progress of the Haitian People — a paramilitary group blamed for killing some 3,000 civilians in the 1990s.

The SGA: UMass' own three-ring circus

The circus that the Student Government Association has become introduced a new stunt to the show Wednesday night. Around 8 p.m., senator David Bettencourt ran into The Massachusetts Daily Collegian newsroom and requested to borrow the long-flat black basketball that has been kicking around the office for longer than most people can remember.

Proclaiming that it was an important event in SGA history, Bettencourt persuaded the Collegian management to let him borrow the basketball. What unfolded 50 yards down the hall in the Campus Center Basement would, in any other place, be considered absolute lunacy. Unfortunately, at UMass it is only the latest in a series of ridiculous events concerning the student government.

The black basketball apparently became an official sign of power, as it was agreed upon that anyone who wanted to speak during Wednesday night's senate meeting would have to be holding the ball, at the behest of speaker Chris Eckel. The preposterous motion which does, in all fairness, have its roots in Greek political structure, harkens back to elementary school, when the only way an overwhelmed teacher could control a room of unruly rugrats was to implement a system where the one child can speak at a time, and that child must be holding a magic wand.

The worst part of this story is not that Eckel proposed such a silly concept — for that, he should probably be applauded for bringing to order the second SGA screaming match in a month — but rather because it was necessary at all.

The Student Government may not be the final decision maker in the legislative process at the University of Massachusetts, but it is a very important voice of the students, and right now the SGA is dropping the ball. Senators and other officials in the SGA should be using this very important time to set up shop for next year, to organize the incoming senators, and to ensure a swift and smooth transition to 2004-05. Instead, a poorly handled election has created a firestorm of rhetoric and a general lack of sense and order.

The controversy surrounding the Office of ALANA Affairs has shown that the SGA is hardly able to organize its own factions, let alone be an influence on the student body at-large. There likely are holes in the ALANA Charter that need to be fixed, problems that need to be worked out, and language that needs to be revised. But the fact that it is taking such a protracted series of poor decisions and mud-slinging sessions does not benefit the students. It only makes the SGA less able to be a strong source of leadership for this campus.

Nokes may be correct in saying that the money given to the OAA should be justified by a proper charter, but the stalling tactics and general disarray do not lend to the sense of propriety that Nokes is claiming to seek.

In an April 2 editorial, The Collegian wrote that, "for the umpteenth time, student government at the University of Massachusetts has failed the student body." It is clear that nothing has changed since. The new elections are scheduled to take place Wednesday and Thursday, and the student body can only hope that somehow things become a little better by then, especially if Eduardo Bustamante and Matthew Murphy win again, because the SGA needs a president and a trustee. It's time to stop the madness.

The FDA and obesity

Jen Hodson

Last month, the Food and Drug Administration proposed its new action plan to confront the nation's obesity problem. Labeled as the "nation's obesity epidemic," the issue has been a conflict ever since the late '80s and is still rising. Statistics show that today 64 percent of Americans are overweight and 30 percent are obese.

Tommy G. Thompson, health and human services secretary, released the new FDA report as a comprehensive strategy for combating the epidemic, which threatens the health of millions of Americans. Generated by the FDA's Obesity Working Group, the report had a list of long- and short-term proposals. These were based on the scientific fact that weight control is mainly a function of caloric balance. The calories in must equal the calories out, later named the "calories count" campaign.

Some of the recommendations included, "To strengthen food labeling, to educate consumers about maintaining a healthy diet and weight and to encourage restaurants to provide calorie and nutrition information." It also recommends "increasing enforcement to ensure food labels accurately portray serving size, revising and reissuing guidance on developing obesity drugs and strengthening coordinated scientific research to reduce obesity and to develop foods that are healthier and low in calories."

Aside from adults, the alarming rate at which obesity affects children has also increased. According to the CDC, "15 percent of children and adolescents, aged 6 to 19 are overweight. This is almost double the rate of two decades ago."

In my opinion, perhaps a stronger focus should be directed toward the younger generations. Younger people are being given more choices nowadays, especially when it comes to food. Snacks that are available on the supermarket shelves were not available 20 years ago and choices of what size, flavor and quantity have also increased.

Perhaps too much TV and a lack of exercise, as well as an unhealthy diet, are linked to the increase in health concerns related to children.

The public school systems are also to blame. An article that ran in the Detroit Free Press less than a month ago took aim at the two biggest culprits: school vending machines and cafeteria a la carte lines that regularly serve pizza and burgers. In a committee hearing on the $6.4 billion National School Lunch Program administered by the U.S. Department of Agriculture, Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa said, "School vending machines and a la carte counters are filled with products from companies that seem determined to super-size everything and everybody. How in the world does a healthy, balanced meal stand a fair chance against billions of dollars worth of marketing?" In response to no alternative he proposed that vending machines as well as a la carte lines be banned.

But this is just one problem. The Boston Globe highlighted another when it featured a story earlier this month that mentioned obesity in children when discussing the link between TV and attention deficit problems in young children. Lead author, Dr. Dimitri Christakis, a researcher at the Children's Hospital and Regional Medical Center in Seattle, directly stated, "The truth is there are lots of reasons for children not to watch television. Other studies have shown it to be associated with obesity and aggressiveness."

Perhaps too much TV and a lack of exercise, as well as an unhealthy diet, are linked to the increase in health concerns related to children. What's important though is that adults start teaching their children at a young age about how to eat healthy. This could be done by enforcing stricter eating regimens, so that children are able to get the proper nutrition they need in order to function healthy and happy lives. However, this can only happen once adults themselves learn how to eat well and control their own caloric intake. Self-awareness is a key factor when it comes to dietary consumption and until adults realize that, they will continue to eat poorly and this continuation will proceed to rub off on future generations.

Additional information from the Detroit Free Press and from the Web site www.fda.gov/oc/initiatives/obesity was used in this editorial.

Repealing the Medicare changes

You might ask why four young graduate students from the University of Massachusetts are advocating for the repeal of the recent changes to Medicare. We became worried when we learned that the Bush Administration's Me-dicare reform bill benefits drug and health insurance companies while our grandparents struggle to pay for their prescriptions. Every generation, not only seniors, will be affected by these new changes.

J. Cherry, Margaret Cunha, Kristin Fontaine, Naveen Surapaneni

If you are currently a senior citizen, the new Medicare bill does not provide the prescription drug coverage you have been hoping for. Instead, there is a good chance your drug costs will increase. As Walter Cronkite narrates in a video produced by the non-profit organization, Families-USA, "The new law explicitly prohibits government from negotiating with drug companies for lower prices."

If you are middle-aged, you should be alarmed as well. The plan you have been paying into toward your future health care may not be available to you when you reach 65. This new bill begins dismantling traditional Medicare and undermines the most successful anti-poverty program in the United States. It subsidizes HMOs and the for-profit insurance agencies while driving up the costs of traditional Medicare forcing seniors to be managed by the insurance industry.

And, if you are a member of the younger generation, like us, you might not think about Medicare. But be aware that these changes impact your employment opportunities. The spike in health care costs, including out-of-control drug prices, has forced many businesses to outsource jobs to countries where the cost of health care is not a factor. This means that there are fewer jobs available for young Americans, many of who go without health coverage already.

The more everyone learns about the new Medicare plan, the less they like it. It falls short of meeting their needs. This bill does nothing to control the skyrocketing drug costs, while feeding the already bulging pockets of health insurance and pharmaceutical companies. In a recent CBS news report, Michael Valentino, the spokesperson for the VA, disclosed that the agency has been negotiating low prices for safe Canadian drugs for years. According to Isaac BenEzra, President of Mass Senior Action Council, "If it's safe for the Pentagon ... why not for Springfield, Boston and American taxpayers who desperately need relief from drug industry profit gouging?"

This bill does nothing to control the skyrocketing drug costs, while feeding the already bulging pockets of health insurance and pharmaceutical companies.

We believe now is a crucial time for all Americans to show their discontent for the harmful Medicare changes. Every generation has a stake in helping today's seniors and ensuring that health care access remains a priority. Join us and be part of an intergenerational movement to save Medicare.

There are plenty of ways you can get involved. Visit www.masssenioraction.org and www.familiesusa.org for more information. Register to vote. Choose candidates who will truly work for affordable health care. Finally, call, write, or email your Senator and Representative to voice your concerns. Find your elected officials at http://www.wheredoivotema.com/bal/myelectioninfo.php

For too long health care access has been a privilege in the United States; it's time for us to join together to ensure that it becomes a right for all.

Roadside Bomb

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

CAMPUS PARKING AND DRIVING CONDITIONS NEED IMPROVEMENT

The condition of the roads and parking lots at the University of Massachusetts is disgraceful. As an undergraduate student living off-campus, I drive to school every day and become embittered as my car navigates through the gauntlet of potholes and trenches between my house and the Mullins Center yellow lot. Each semester, I expect the conditions to be improved, but the University does not appear to be taking any action. Meanwhile, my car's suspension system takes a beating, my undercarriage bottoms out and my animosity grows.

As far as terrible parking conditions are concerned, the yellow lot behind the Mullins Center is one of the worst parking lots I have ever seen. Rather than paved, with clear lines showing where the parking spots are located, it is a field of gravel with lines drawn haphazardly to show where we are supposed to park. One problem is that as cars move through the lot during the semester, the rocks are moved around and the lines mysteriously disappear. The lot becomes even worse whenever it rains because small streams flow through the lot, creating massive ditches that my car cannot avoid. By the time add/drop is over, the lot is nothing but a muddy expanse of rocks and potholes with cars crammed into any six foot-wide gap they can find.

In addition to the yellow lot being in poor condition, many of the roads on campus are so littered with potholes and bumps that I rarely drive to campus without bottoming out at least once. University Drive is easily the most damaged street here at UMass. The stretch between Southwest and the intersection of Amity Street is the bumpiest ride you will find on campus. The problem is that the University only covers up the potholes whenever they form in the winter, rather than take a few days to re-pave the street. When the potholes are filled in, they make uneven, convex bumps in the street and only add to the problem.

As an out-of-state student, I pay approximately $20 thousand per year, and I have to maneuver through the poorly maintained roads and parking lots. Since so many upperclassmen live off-campus in the Five College Area, I think it is only fair that the University recognizes the poor state of its parking lots and roads. With the extravagant prices we pay for parking permits and meters, it is only fair that the University takes action to correct these problems.

A younger gamer's 'Fantasy'

Press Start to Play

Reid Davenport

After a long wait, Gamecube owners can now get their "Final Fantasy" fill with "Final Fantasy Crystal Chronicles." Square Enix just recently started making "Final Fantasy" games on the GameBoy-SP and has finally — no pun intended — moved on to appease the Gamecube owners' need for a new "Final Fantasy" game.

"Crystal Chronicles" brings another original tale to the "Final Fantasy" franchise and a new style of game play. You can now bring in your friends' characters to battle along your character's side in multiplayer mode. It uses the same type of battle mode that was utilized by the popular "Final Fant-asy XI Online" game with modifications making it handle more like the popular PC game "Diab-lo:" you run around slashing enemies for items, basically. The game also delivers the classic feel and look that any "Final Fantasy" game should bring to the table.

'Final Fantasy Crystal Chronicles' Gamecube — Publisher: Nintendo — Developer: Square Enix — ESRB: E — Grade: B

The start of the game gives you the choice to create up to eight different characters by choosing their race, look, gender and their family's craft such as blacksmiths or alchemists. The craft you choose will be the key in developing a strong team of players to choose from at your journey's start. A good starter would be the blacksmith while something like alchemist might need more time to build.

Get ready to not earn super magic right off the bat as you have to find spells each time you go into a level. You can then combine spells to create a more powerful one, called "gravity," which is good against [illegible] & defintech. Help out when you need to cure or if you want to do some long range attacks to revive your energy.

The game will start off slow at first, even for fans of the franchise. It is not like FFX where enemies randomly attack and puzzles block your path. It is more of a run and attack set up with forced video sequences while you travel along paths. You will hear quite a bit about a "black knight" and occasionally you will have thieves steal some items.

In the first level, you should encounter everything you will run into in other levels and most of the enemies are the same in the first few sets of areas. You can easily learn how to dodge attacks, use magic, use items, have your Moggle move around with your water chalice, and solve gate-opening puzzles. You will also encounter a boss at the end, which may give you some trouble the first time around, but it should be easy to finish him off and level up your character.

The key to the story is the chalice, which can recover your health when you carry it and will help you pass the "Miasma Streams" at the end of the maps. You can change the element of the chalice in certain levels and that is what you will need to do in order to move on. With each boss you defeat you will get closer to ridding the world of "Miasma."

The GameBoy-SP option is a nice addition as you can see a map of the level on the GBA while you play. To use this option you will need a GBA-SP connector cable (sold separately of course) and a GBA without a game in it.

While it is not required to use the GBA connection to play the game, it is required to use the multiplayer option. Even though the game requires all players to have a GBA and a connector, it is definitely an option worth taking advantage of. You and your friends can fly through levels much faster and you will not have such a difficult time healing and running around. It also adds a new way to play around with both systems as opposed to a game like "Zelda: Wind Waker" where there is just an added bonus if you bought the connector. This may seem annoying to gamers who cannot afford to purchase a few GBAs and connectors to play with friends, but people who already own the required accessories will be glad to get some long-term use out of the rarely used connectors.

Overall, "Final Fantasy Crystal Chronicles" has a smooth feel to it but the story line feels a bit weak when matched up against the popular "Final Fantasy X" or "X-2" and the graphics are not as mind blowing as recent titles. The new style of the game will definitely keep players going for a bit, but this "Final Fantasy" is a bit more of a "small doses over time" than a "finish in a week" game. Unless of course you have your friends playing the multiplayer, in which case we'll see you in the summer when you finally leave your room. "Final Fantasy Crystal Chronicles" is now available at your local retailer. The GBA connectors run between $10 and $20 if you're looking to take advantage of the multiplayer option.

Pioneer Valley feels the revenge of the N.E.R.D.

Hip-hoppers Pharrell and Shay invade Northampton with a powerful performance at Smith College

By Monique Jemmott
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Tuesday night at Smith College, Five College students discovered that being a "NERD" is cooler than they thought.

The John M. Green hall at Smith College was packed with fans eager to see Virgin Records recording artists N.E.R.D., comprised of super-producers Pharrell Williams, Chad Hugo and Shay. The Smith college recreation council put on the performance.

The Boston band The Three Kings opened the show. The group, which consists of a lyricist, a reggae artist, as well as male and female vocalists, delivered a highly energetic performance showcasing many different styles of music including hip-hop, reggae, ska and the beautiful harmonies of classically trained female vocals. The band's eclectic, yet soulful-funk sound was the utopian ideal of P. Diddy's newest project "Da Band", as well as a compliment to the headlining act.

N.E.R.D. Smith College — Northampton — April 20

Although it took a little time, the crowd warmed up to The Three Kings, and while it was not a hysterical display, the undivided attention of the crowd was assurance that they were enjoying the diverse band and its messages of freedom, struggle, redemption and survival.

The Three Kings were followed by an unexpected, yet enjoyable performance by Spy Mob, N.E.R.D.'s house band, who just released its debut album last week. The band, which was a nonsense rock band, performed its first single "Sitting Around Keeping Score", a radio-friendly track with heavy drum sets and a catchy melody.

COURTESY NERD.COM

N.E.R.D. played at Smith College's John M. Greene Hall on Tuesday to a largely female crowd.

After a 30-minute delay, N.E.R.D. finally hit the stag, sending the crowd of mostly women into a frenzy.

N.E.R.D. frontman, Pharrell Williams, stepped onto the stage wearing a red marine-style jacket saluting the crowd, as he and Shane of N.E.R.D. performed "Drill Sergeant" from their current album "Fly or Die." Chad Hugo, the third member of the group, was not present at the performance; the crowd didn't seem to mind as endless hysterical screams continued throughout the show.

The entire performance seemed to be catered to the ladies in the audience, with many sexual innuendos and much flirting between Pharrell and the front row female audience members. When the song "Brain" was performed, Pharrell stood on top of an onstage picnic table and to the crowd's pleasure made gestures that gave unfamiliar concertgoers the new meaning of the term "Brain."

It wasn't long before Pharrell began to work on the crowd full blast with his endearingly offbeat voice as he serenaded them with "I love you girl." Hearts were won as he asked the crowd: "Do you wanna go home with me girl?" Needless to say, more screaming ensued.

"She wants to move" was next and the audience took the song's lyrics quite literally. After a random girl made her way on to the stage to "Move", and had to be escorted off by Pharrell's personal bodyguard, a bra was thrown onto the stage by another hot and bothered concertgoer.

"I love this school!" Pharrell exclaimed as he retrieved the lingerie from the stage floor.

The hour-long set concluded with two of N.E.R.D.'s biggest singles from its debut album, "Rockstar" and "Lap Dance." The crowd rushed to the front of the stage at the request of Pharrell to "really get crazy and turn this shit out."

After many requests from fans, Pharrell removed his shirt, but not before his request was met for five more brassieres. The energetic performance ended on a high note, leaving audience satisfied, bra-less and begging for more.

Offstage the members of N.E.R.D. seemed more critical than their fans of their performance.

"We have a lot of work to do," Pharrell said of the performance. "N.E.R.D is a fairly new concept, so in this area we have to work on it."

The members of the band explained the difference between the oftentimes confused N.E.R.D. and the Neptune's "N.E.R.D.," it is like a morph of the Neptune's explained Shane. "It's always existed since the beginning of time, but just not on the surface as much as [it does] now."

College Dropout plays Mount Holyoke

By Monique Jemmott
Collegian Staff

The voice of hip-hop's future will hit the Valley this weekend at Mount Holyoke College in South Hadley. Roc-A-Fella recording artist Kanye West will perform to a sold-out audience Sunday night, and show the Five College community what this "College Dropout" is made of.

Kanye West — Sunday — Mount Holyoke — South Hadley — Sold Out

The 26-year-old Chicago native garnered success prior to the release of his album "College Dropout" in February, by producing chart toppers for artists such as Jay-Z, Janet Jackson, Talib Kweli and Alicia Keys.

And although this is his first solo effort, he has been a household name in the industry for some time now. His style has been compared to that of Quincy Jones for his soulful beats largely influenced by old school R&B. Jay-Z's "IZZO" beat draws from samples of the Jackson 5's "I Want You Back", and Talib Kweli's "Good to You" features a sample of a sped up R&B classic for the chorus.

"I feel like a lot of the soul that's in those old records that I sample is in me," he explained in an interview with VH1 earlier this year. But the craft that turned Kanye West into a hit maker extraordinaire was born from his love for rapping. His love for rhyming can be traced back to the third grade.

"I started making beats just so I could have something to rap over," he said. It was when he received advice from fellow Chicagoan and beat maker NO I.D. that he discovered the core of his new found craft. "NO I.D. told me 'you need to sample off records' when I found that out, it was all over."

And he has taken his love along with his God-given talent of an ear for music to breathe life into hip-hop.

It has been difficult for artists in the Roc-A-Fella camp to assume a position in the game, oftentimes finding themselves in the shadow of general J-Hova, but West with good timing (an album release date post "The Black Album") and heavy mix tape rotation has appeared to overcome this obstacle.

He illustrates this with his lyrics on "Through the Wire," "But I'm a champion, so I turned tragedy to triumph, make music that's fire, spit my soul through the wire."

His debut single "Through the Wire," an honest, emotional account of the events of a near-fatal car accident in 2002, which was recorded while West's mouth was literally wired shut as a result of injuries sustained in the accident, spent endless weeks on Billboards Top 100 chart, prior to the release of "College Dropout" in February 2004. He belts out about his advancement in "Last Call," "Now was Kanye the most overlooked? Yes sir/ now is Kanye the most overbooked? Yes sir/ though the fans want the feeling of A Tribe Called Quest/ But all they got left is this guy called West."

Perhaps the success of this hip-hop phenom is a combination of good timing, and a winning team, or more invitingly the return of the new and inventive to the uniformed face of hip-hop. You can't quite fit Kanye into any of the pre-destined categories that exist in the game today.

Annual Cultural Night

Event marks 35 years of ASA

By Adamma Udokwu
Collegian Staff

The African Students Association is holding its 35th Annual Cultural Night tomorrow. The event will begin promptly at 8 p.m. and will run until midnight. An after party will follow until about 2 a.m.

35th Annual Cultural Night — Tonight — Campus Center Auditorium — $10, $8

This will be the ASA's second cultural night this school year and many involved are excited and anticipate a great night of entertainment, delicious food and exquisite displays of African dances and clothing. They anticipate a good turnout for this semester's Cultural Night. It is an event that many enjoy and return to every year.

Kamiliyah Napoli, of Cambridge, who graduated in May 2003 with a degree in Chemical Engineering, said, "I think this is a great celebration of our culture as an African people and even though I have graduated, I love coming back and participating."

The ASA has a good amount of sponsors this semester who contributed to help make this event possible, including The office of ALANA Affairs, Art council, the Black Student Union, Sigma Psi Epsilon and Coca-Cola. In addition to the funds they have received, the group has also been doing some fundraising of their own by selling T-shirts that contain a depiction of an African woman/man on them.

The theme for this semester's Cultural Night is "The Great African Woman." It will be a celebration of 35 great African women, signifying the 35 years since the first African Students Association Cultural Night.

"It will mostly be a woman night, celebrating African womanhood," said Karen KouKou a sophomore Political Science Major who is in charge of conducting the fashion show and is one of the three members of the Cultural Chair of The ASA. KouKou said, "I'm really excited about the show, last semester's was very successful. Our goal of the night is to teach people of women and people of Africa, (because) this is a celebration of Africa."

It's Go time!

Participants compete in Nathan's Famous Hot Dog Eating Contest yesterday at the Taste of UMass festival. The event offered attendees a chance to sample delicacies from the university dining halls as well as dozens of vendors from around the Pioneer Valley. Charlie Ferron, sophomore exercise science major, placed third in the contest, eating eight and a half dogs. Patrick Tuite, a freshman civil engineering major, came in second, putting away nine dogs. But the champion was Damien Yee, an undeclared sophomore, who demolished 11 dogs to win the contest.

Hippodrome ready to rumble thanks to UMass grad Zabian

In a place normally reserved for dance music and revelers, the sport known as "the sweet science" will make its mark in the Pioneer Valley tonight.

Fighter and promoter Salah Zabian, a 2001 graduate of the University of Massachusetts, is both promoting and participating in a five-fight boxing event at Springfield's Hippodrome tonight, starting at 7:30 p.m. Zabian's fight, against Mike Needling, is the third fight on the card.

Zabian has been boxing since he was 14 years old, and while his roughly 5-foot-10 frame isn't quite larger than life, his dreams are. The Lenox native's ultimate goal is to work for boxer Oscar De La Hoya, whose Golden Boy Enterprises is one of the most well-known boxing promotion houses in the country.

"My entire reason for promoting is to get a job with Oscar De La Hoya or Sugar Ray Leonard," said Zabian, a cruiserweight whose fights have been televised on pay-per-view, Fox Sports Network and the FX channel.

For now, though, Zabian is sticking to his roots with tonight's show in Springfield. The fight is, according to Zabian, the cheapest price in pro boxing. The ticket, which also covers access to the Hippodrome nightclub for the evening is $20 for students with an ID, $30 for non-student general admission, and $40 for a ringside seat.

"I'm a UMass graduate, and I tailor it toward students, because I know a lot of students go to the Hippodrome on the weekend, and they normally pay $8 to get in. This will cover their entrance fee to the club, as well as the boxing match, and I think it would be a good audience because college students here would want to support a local fighter," Zabian said.

Rudy Brown rocks the Valley

Band to play as part of 'Extravaganja'

By Peter J. Blandino
Collegian Correspondant

You may have seen them perform amidst the mania of a raging house party, or perhaps you caught their recent set at the Harp. But whether you have seen them play at a dining hall in the Central Residential Area or a crowded attic in Hadley, there is more to the story of Rudy Brown that has yet to be revealed. This past Thursday Adam Mann and Dave Gagnon, along with guitarist Dan Thomas, related their experiences.

In September 2001 Dan Thomas and Adam Mann left the streets of Weymouth for the rolling fields of Western Massachusetts. Soon after moving into the Baker Dormitory, they met bassist Dave Gagnon and began to make music around the quad, thus forming the core of what would become Rudy Brown (the band recently added the guitar of Dave "the mayor" Brown).

Together in their junior high days, Gagnon and Mann began emulating the grunge music that was predominant in the early and mid-'90s and then they progressed into funk and rock. Gagnon began playing bass at 10 years of age learning guitar parts by ear, and was influenced by the melodic style of Sublime's Eric Wilson. Fully competent in sharing the lead with Thomas, Gagnon's driving melodies fill the space between drum and guitar while adding a distinct flavor to the band's music. While each member specified certain influences, the band is receptive to enough music to fill five articles. Their art, however, is distinctly their own and even the most critical listener would be hard pressed to trace their music to a single particular root.

Rudy Brown
Tonight

Amherst

The band members, particularly Thomas, elaborated on the importance that performance and improvisation have in relation to their craft. Although Brown insists that their success is due to their image as "long-haired sluggards," there is nothing sluggish about a Rudy Brown show, and their success is due to long hours of practice and passionate dedication. While Thomas tried to explain the band's collective enjoyment in driving a room, packed dangerously beyond capacity, to the brink of ecstasy, a certain far away look (even farther than normal) washed over his face.

The weekend revelery is a time for us to seek release from the web of routine; the monotony of working life, the perpetual demand for production, and the stress of deadlines. Rudy Brown offers this release. They are hedonism without the hangover.

The band will be playing tomorrow on the Amherst Common for the annual "Extravaganja." Busy this weekend? There is no need for alarm. Bonds dominating the game like no one else

By Janie McCauley
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Hall of Famer Orlando Cepeda told everyone almost a decade ago that he'd never seen someone swing a bat as well as Barry Bonds.

"And people looked at me funny," Cepeda recalled.

Nobody's arguing now, not with Bonds batting .500 — yep, .500! — and connecting for nine home runs among his first 19 hits. He even homered in seven straight games, one shy of the major league record.

"What he's doing is pretty special," first baseman J.T. Snow said.

Bonds, a six-time NL MVP, got a much-needed day off Thursday when the Giants concluded a four-game series against the San Diego Padres. He is expected to play all three weekend games in Los Angeles against the Dodgers.

"He is really tired," manager Felipe Alou said. "You can see it in the outfield. He's been busy." That's for sure.

Bonds' homer streak ended Wednesday, just short of tying the mark shared by Dale Long (1956), Don Mattingly (1987) and Ken Griffey Jr. (1993). With the game out of reach — the Giants lost 11-0 — Bonds asked to be taken out in the eighth inning.

Bonds, who turns 40 in July, has 667 homers, behind only Hank Aaron (755) and Babe Ruth (714). If he stays healthy and keeps up his pace, Bonds could reach 700 this season.

He set the single-season home run record of 73 in 2001. This season, he's performed fantastically at the plate while dealing with questions about his personal trainer's drug distribution case and whether Bonds has used steroids.

"His weapon is his mind," said Cepeda, who hit 379 homers in 17 major league seasons. "He's brilliant. He amazes me the way he plays the game of baseball. In all his years, I've seen him look bad at the plate two times. Guys look bad at the plate five times a day.

"He has the best sight. It's incredible. People should come to the ballpark just to say, 'I saw Barry Bonds.' I played with Hank Aaron, Willie Mays and Frank Robinson. There's nobody better than Barry Bonds, and he's nearly 40 years old."

Rich Donnelly, now a third-base coach for the Brewers, was a coach for Bonds from 1986-92 when the slugger first came up with the Pittsburgh Pirates.

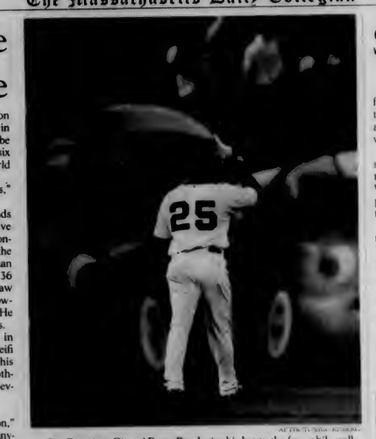
Donnelly points out that Bonds has made his mark as more than merely a great hitter.

"The two greatest baserunners I've ever seen are Larry Walker and Barry Bonds," Donnelly said. "It's not always about stolen bases. ... Nobody makes a play down the left-field line like Barry Bonds. He's still the best at it."

How does he keep his body going at this late stage in his career?

"Talent," Giants trainer Stan Conte said. "Talent sums up skill, genetics and psychological all in one."

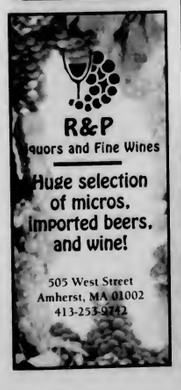
His teammates can appreciate what Bonds is doing, even if the defending NL West champion Giants are having a rough April in the win column. That seems to be wearing on Bonds, who fell six outs short of winning the World Series in 2002.



"I only take comfort in wins," Bonds said.

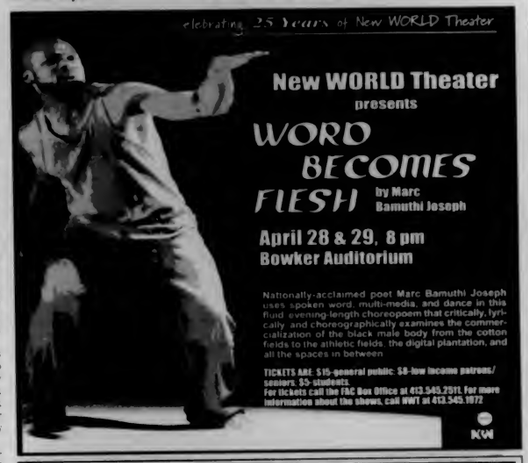
In his last two games, Bonds saw 29 pitches and only five strikes. He swung once — connecting for his ninth homer of the season, a two-run shot off Brian Lawrence on Tuesday. Only 36 percent of the pitches Bonds saw last season were strikes, the lowest frequency in the majors. He walked 148 times in 130 games.

"They have to get him in another league," shortstop Neifi Perez said. "He's not for this league. They need to make another big league for him. It's unbelievable."



Cepeda agrees.

"To me, he's one in a million," Cepeda said. "You won't see anything like that again. The things he's doing are unreal. He thrills me every day. I'm praying I can be like him in my next life."



San Francisco Giants' Barry Bonds tips his hat to the fans while walking out to left field during the top of the eighth inning of their game against the Milwaukee Brewers in San Francisco, Tuesday. In the bottom of the seventh inning Bonds hit his 661st career home run.

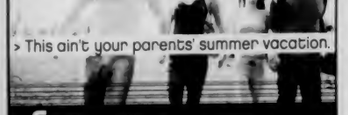
for himself, so you try to keep the ball live, and hopefully it's a 50/50 ball and you come up with half of them.

"They're going to win their share of faceoffs, but you hope that won't make a difference. With the style that both teams play, I think we're both going to get our opportunities."

While Corno is far and away the faceoff specialist for the Hoyas, having taken almost 82 percent of the draws, the Minutemen have found a combination of Dane Collins and Michael Baggetta to be the answer this year. Collins has taken the majority of the draws (196 of 226), but freshman Michael Baggetta has become a quality relief man, and won five of 11 faceoffs.

What is on the Minutemen's side, though, is recent history. One of the biggest wins in UMass' school record-setting 13-1 2003 season was the 11-8 victory on April 19. The No. 6 Minutemen never trailed, and handed the No. 3 Hoyas their first loss of the season on the strength of four goals from Jeff Zywicki, who is in the process of taking a medical hardship waiver for the 2004 season.

After Saturday, the schedule gets no easier, with No. 5 Syracuse and No. 10 Rutgers on the docket, but for the Minutemen, it's all about tomorrow.



"We have another opportunity to play, and the question is are we ready to take the opportunity, and I think we are," Cannella said.

UConn snaps UMass' win streak

By Brendan Hall
Collegian Staff

History repeats itself again.

For the second straight year, the Massachusetts softball team headed into Storrs, CT, only to have their double-digit win streak snapped by a one-run affair with the Connecticut Huskies.

UMass	3
UConn	4

The Minutewomen (22-12) gave up a school record 18 hits to UConn on the day, but it still took nine innings and a flare down the leftfield line for the Huskies (20-18) to prevail, 4-3.

For the Maroon and White, the powerful Husky bats gave aces Kelli Arnold and Jenna Busa trouble all day.

"I just think that on the mound we were not as sharp as we needed to be, particularly in two-out situations where we had shut them down and then allowed them to get a hit, and then the next batter would get a hit," coach Elaine Sortino said. "I think defense starts on the mound. I think the pitcher is the neutralizer, and I thought it just wasn't a good defensive day for us."

The Minutewomen encountered more problems beyond their first line of defense.

"There were four or five other balls where I thought fielding-wise we didn't play defense the way we normally do, particularly on the right side of the field," Sortino said.

Ashley Campen kicked the game off with a bang, leading the bottom of the first by knocking Arnold's first pitch over the right field wall for a very early 1-0 lead.

Two batters later Maggie Argobast doubled to left, and came home on the very next at bat thanks to a Jen D'Angelo double to left to make it 2-0 after one.

UMass answered right back with two runs of its own in the very next frame, and Pam Sulick's leadoff homer in the fourth gave the Minutewomen a lead for the time being. But the Huskies tied it back up in the bottom of the fourth on an RBI single from Stephanie DiBiase.

The game was a wash until the ninth inning, when Arnold was pulled in the fifth in favor of Busa, after giving up 11 hits and three runs.

The Minutewomen had a golden opportunity in the eighth with Hilary Puglia on second and Jamie Cahalan on first, with just one out, but KJ Kelley and Sulick both went down swinging to end the inning.

Jen Ward came up big in the ninth with a game-winning single that scored D'Angelo for the win. The Minutewomen return home today for a doubleheader against Maine, and will look to extend their 64-game home win streak.

If they are to hold their own against the Black Bears, a better all-around performance is a must.

"We have to play well," Sortino said. "We have to pitch a little bit better, obviously defend a little better, and hopefully we'll drive more balls, put more balls in play to give ourselves more chances to score. We have to be a little bit better in everything, and if we are we'll be fine."

The Black Bears currently boast four players hitting above .330 on their roster, alongside two aces on the mound who both maintain an ERA of under 1.60.

On Sunday, the Minutewomen will have the honor of playing the first two games at the brand new Ambler Softball Complex in Philadelphia, against Atlantic 10 foe Temple.

Currently battling for first place in the A-10, it will be a christening like no other.

"Temple's the whole deal. Temple's a conference game, it's far more important than anything we've done thus far this week, so we know we need to go there and play well and take care of our own business," Sortino said.

COURTESY KAREN WINKER

Sophomore third-baseman Katie Jo Kelley leads the Minutewomen in home runs (12) and RBIs (29). UMass takes on Maine today at the UMass Softball Complex, with the game slated to start at 3:30 p.m.

A reporter remembers 'the streak'

Brendan Hall

Alas, the streak has come to an end.

For the first time in 15 games and nearly six weeks, the Massachusetts softball team has come up on the losing end of the stick. It's been one wild ride for these 21 girls, with an array of memorable moments to reflect upon.

You could start at the beginning of this stretch, in sunny Miami. After falling to Florida International 2-1 earlier in the day in the Blue and Gold Classic, the Minutewomen rebounded on the arm of Jenna Busa to down Virginia Tech 4-0. The sophomore hurled her first career no-hitter, and was just one walk from a perfect game.

Busa's efforts on the mound led the Minutewomen into the championship game, a rematch against FIU. Down 3-2 in the final at bat of the game, Pam Sulick hit a blooper to centerfield that knocked in two runs, giving the Maroon and White a dramatic 4-3 win and the championship.

The game was a huge momentum booster for the Minutewomen, who were 9-11 at the time.

"I thought that was a great game. It showed great fortitude by the team, and I think we've had a lot of poise since that game," coach Elaine Sortino said.

And who could forget that other brilliant sophomore, KJ Kelley? In these past six weeks, the third baseman has gone from role player to starring attraction, setting two new records along the way.

She started off her run to the record books with a two home run game against LaSalle in game two of their doubleheader. The two-homer effort was part of a record-setting day that saw the Minutewomen hit a team-record four homers total.

Kelley followed up the game in Philly with another two-homer day against Central Connecticut State. In all, she tallied four such home runs in three games, an amazing feat.

Then there is, of course, the best homer of all. In the third inning of a game against Boston College, Kelley cranked a 2-0 pitch over the right-center fence for a school record 12th homer of the season. The crowd went wild, her team stormed home plate, and the Minutewomen went on to slam the Eagles 4-0.

The Maroon and White still hold the nation's longest home winning streak, at 64 — and when that comes to a halt, you can bet yours truly will have a whole lot more to say.

Men's lax takes on Georgetown

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

Every week, the message is the same for the Massachusetts men's lacrosse team: This game is the biggest game of the season.

It's typical coachspeak, the kind of sports mantra that inspires players to go out and give it the old college try, and bores sportswriters to death. For the most part, it works.

This week, however, there's no question. When the 6-5 Minutemen (1-0 Eastern College Athletic Conference) travel to Georgetown to take on the 7-2 Hoyas (1-0 ECAC), it is the definitive benchmark for the UMass season. A sluggish start led to a four-game winning streak for the Minutemen, but that was snapped a week ago when the Yale Bulldogs, losers of five straight, took them to double-overtime before upsetting the then-No. 19 Minutemen, 9-8.

As a result, UMass has fallen from both the Inside Lacrosse media poll and the United States Intercollegiate Lacrosse Association coaches' poll. A drop from the polls this late in the season certainly doesn't make entry into the NCAA tournament easy, especially without the automatic bid the ECAC lost when Maryland-Baltimore County and Navy skipped out of town for greener pastures in the Patriot League.

However, the Minutemen's schedule is very bottom-heavy, and while treading water just above .500 with three games to go is a tough hand to play, three of the better programs in the nation remain. First comes Georgetown, ranked No. 7 by Inside Lacrosse and USILA, tomorrow at 1 p.m.

"You just ask your guys, you want them to be ready and prepared, mentally and physically, but they have to be able to control their emotions during the 60 minutes of lacrosse," UMass coach Greg Cannella said. "Don't try to do too much, don't try to be the guy who does more than what you have to do. The guys are hyped up, ready to go, so it's hard."

Among the many things the Hoyas do well, top faceoff man Andy Corno is winning almost 69 percent of his draws. That has helped Georgetown to an average of 9.89 goals per game, more than two full goals better than its opponents this year.

"You try to prepare for [Corno], you try to play to your strengths rather to your weaknesses, you try to counter him," Cannella said. "He wins so many balls

Senior midfielder Justin Walker has made an appearance in every game for the Minutemen this year, picking up 10 ground balls. UMass travels to Washington D.C. tomorrow to take on Georgetown for a 1 p.m. face-off.

Minutewomen look for a pair

By Jeff Howe
Collegian Staff

This is the absolute most important weekend of the season for the Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (3-9, 1-3 A-10) as it plays two games in Philadelphia against conference rivals St. Joseph's and LaSalle.

On Monday morning, they will have a better idea as to whether or not they still have a shot of sneaking into the Atlantic 10 postseason. The team is currently sitting in seventh place in the conference with only three remaining games so there is no room for error.

As it stands right now, UMass may need a couple of teams to lose over the season's final week because only four teams will qualify for the A-10 playoffs on May 7th and 8th.

For what it's worth, this is probably the best lacrosse team with a 3-9 record in the country, but its youth and lack of experience have caused an inability to close out games or capitalize on other teams' mistakes.

Still, they are only a few goals and a couple breaks away from having a solid record. Their five losses by a total of six goals show just how close this team could have been to national recognition.

UMass will take the field at St. Joseph's (6-3, 1-2 A-10) today trying to break a pair of streaks. The Minutewomen have lost three consecutive games against A-10 opponents since winning their conference opener against Duquesne while St. Joe's will be looking to break a school record by winning their fourth consecutive game.

The Hawks play a much lower scoring game than UMass has been used to playing this season. Junior goaltender Courtney Huff has a ridiculously low 8.84 goals against average.

On the season, St. Joe's has only scored an average of 9.23 goals per game. When they need goals, though, they can look to senior Kristen Teklinski who has notched 23 this season.

She scored four goals and two assists in the Hawks' 9-3 win on Tuesday, moving her into third on the school's all-time points list. She is also third in goals scored and tied for sixth in assists.

The Minutewomen will stay in Phiadelphia for Sunday's 11 a.m. match up with La Salle (3-10, 0-4), the Atlantic 10's last place team.

The Explorers' main scoring threat is Kristen Davis who has 32 goals and 12 assists for 44 points. UMass junior Kristin St. Hilaire will almost certainly defend her.

La Salle has lost five in a row, and they have been outscored 70-39 during that stretch.

UMass has been lead all season by seniors Tracey Drown and Hope Zellinger, and neither has seen their squad miss the postseason.

Hobbled Minutemen face Rams

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

If the rain doesn't get them, the injuries will.

It seems that the Massachusetts baseball team can't catch a break recently. After nearly three weeks of postponed games due to inclimate weather, the Minutemen came out firing and swept St. Joseph's on April 17th and 18th. Then, only a week later at the Beanpot Tournament, UMass lost Adam Stojanowski and Bill Rankin.

Although Rankin's status is unknown right now, offensive powerhouse Stojanowski looks to be out for the season with a broken hand.

All of this will come into play this weekend, when the Minutemen take on Fordham in a three-game series in the friendly confines of Earl Lorden Field on Saturday and Sunday.

Coach Mike Stone, is hardly worried about the situation at hand, rather he is looking at it as a challenge to his players who are normally vying for a starting nod.

"The injuries have been a factor in certain situations but you can't dwell on those. You have to have people to step up and make a difference, but this happens in athletics," Stone said. "Other people need to be more comfortable in order for me to feel confident to put them in the lineup. We're just trying to do the best we can with the people that put the time and effort in to play now it's their turn."

The pitching for UMass has been solid with starters Eric Chown and Matt Torra leading the way. It is the other side of the ball that has been hurting the Maroon and White.

Stone has been concerned with his team's offensive production over the past couple of weeks. In the Minutemen's last two losses they have tallied a respectable seven runs, but it is the 19 batters left on base that has Stone discouraged.

"We've gotten good pitching for most of the game and we've played well enough to win," Koch said. "We need to hit, we need to hit better, and I'm disappointed with our offensive output, we make a lot of things happen then shut down."

Fordham hasn't had the best pitching this year and has exercised its bullpen throughout the season. One thing the Rams do posses, is a steady lineup that has the ability to test the strongest rotation.

The Rams have five batters hitting above .300 on the year, with Kurt Thomas leading the way pacing the team in average (.358), hits (44), and RBIs (28).

Stone remains un-phased by the daunting lineup.

"I don't spend a lot of time worrying about what the other team does. I mean we have pitching charts from years past and ways to pitch to people," Stone said. "We feel pretty confident in our pitchers, especially our first two, so if they're on they'll pitch like they normally pitch."

Team morale has been on a roller coaster ride over the past couple of weeks, but Stone is confident that his team is ready and anxious to play on their home turf. This weekend will be the first time UMass has had an A-10 opponent in Amherst and Stone knows his boys are ready.

"They should be ready, it's the first time we haven't gotten on the bus on Friday to travel somewhere, except we got rained out with Richmond," Stone said. "So I would think that they would be pretty fired up."

SoccerFest pits UMass against Rutgers

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

It's been more than five months since the Massachusetts men's soccer team ended its fall season. A season that fell short of expectations and left an unsatisfying taste in the mouths of coach Sam Koch and his squad.

Now Koch and his crew have a chance to see what's coming next year.

New Balance and the UMass Sports Management program have set up SoccerFest for this Sunday. SoccerFest is a daylong festivity that will showcase some of the finest soccer talent on campus, with the Minutemen headlining in their game against Rutgers.

Last year UMass boasted a 4-2 victory over the North Carolina Tar Heels, the 2001 national champions. Koch is excited to see how his team responds to another talented squad, and knows that the experience can only be beneficial.

"Anytime you play a really good team it tests you. It's excellent for us as far as being tested by a good team to see where we are," Koch said. "We have a number of players that haven't played much and here's an opportunity to get some playing time against a very good opponent. We'll get a pretty good idea on whether they can do it or not."

The Minutemen lost a lot of offense to graduation, including Ptah Myers, last years leading goal-scorer (9). Leading the way for UMass will be Oral Bullen and a slew of young talent who are poised to take over the offensive load next year.

Although he has a lot of youthful depth, Koch has some concern about the way his offense has been executing. In the fall, Myers and Bullen played off each other to set up chances. Now with one vital cog missing UMass must find a way to get on the same page.

"Offensively we're just not there yet, we're not hitting on all pistons. There is some new combinations on top and we haven't been able to get the most out of personnel yet," Koch said. "It's like spring training where the pitchers are ahead of the hitters, right now our defense is better than our offense."

Craig Canavan was the glue that held the Minuteman defense together in the fall, but sustained a season-ending injury halfway through the season. In his absence, UMass was forced to fill the gap with several young players.

This group became battle-worn over the final weeks of the season and hasn't missed a beat coming into spring training. Tim Kitchell, Chris Camerota, Todd Skelton and Jason Scudamore have been the core of the defense, and Koch is confident in their progress.

"Offensively we're not as dangerous, defensively we're better. So we shifted a little bit so it's more difficult for us to get scored on," Koch said. "I think we are better organized and that comes with age."

SoccerFest will also exhibit some of the unheralded talent in the area with three-on-three and a six-on-six tournaments. The tournament ranges from ages 10 to over 30, with New Balance sneakers awarded to the winners of each division.

Clarett blocked from NFL draft

By Gina Holland
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — Maurice Clarett's bid to enter the NFL draft this weekend was turned down by the Supreme Court on Thursday, delaying for now his attempt to get into the league.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said she saw no reason to overturn a lower court's stay preventing the former Ohio State running back from being picked.

The 20-year-old Clarett is fighting the NFL's requirement that players wait three years after high school before turning pro.

Ginsburg said she would not intervene given the NFL's "commitment promptly to conduct a supplemental draft" if Clarett eventually is determined eligible.

The NFL had said Clarett could participate in training camps this summer, if he wins his case in a lower court.

"Today's decision confirms the judgment of the court of appeals and allows us to turn our focus from the courtroom to the draft room," Jeff Pash, the NFL's in-house attorney, said in a statement.

Calls to Clarett's attorney were not immediately returned.

The decision also keeps wide receiver Mike Williams of Southern California out of the draft. Williams, who entered the draft after the original decision allowing in Clarett, would have been a first-round pick while Clarett likely would have gone in the second or third round.

Clarett was appealing a stay issued Monday by the New York-based 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, putting on hold a lower-court ruling that said the NFL can't enforce its three-year rule.

Ginsburg issued the decision because she oversees appeals from New York, which is where the NFL is based.

Marchers defend right to choose

By Ferron Salniker
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON — They came in packed buses from across the nation. Some wore pink from head to toe, while others wore T-shirts with self-designed slogans. Most carried purple and yellow signs, and recited cheers until their voices grew hoarse. All, almost one million, marched through the nation's capital yesterday for the March for Women's Lives.

Thousands of students, organizers, politicians, actors and others from the United States and nearly 60 other countries marched through Washington in an effort to send a message to President Bush and conservative politicians: The choice of an abortion and equal access to birth control and health care is a basic human right.

Before the march began, the rally on the National Mall stretched back about one mile. The group walked, chanting and singing, passing the Washington Monument and later heading down Pennsylvania Avenue in the direction of the White House.

Young people, in particular college students, made up what organizers said was one third of the crowd. Almost 300 colleges sent buses to the march. Among those college students were hundreds of Five College students.

"I'm here for all my friends who couldn't be here," said Anna Graseck, a Smith College student. "I'm marching so there are no back-alley abortions in my lifetime."

Graseck was joined by almost 200 Smith College students.

"Two hundred from Smith College?" said an elderly woman, as the group marched forward, displaying their banner and cheering. "That's amazing!"

Lauren Robertson and Brittany Fosbrook, sophomores at Mount Holyoke College, drove to the District of Columbia separately from the rest of the 150 Mount Holyoke students.

"I'm here in particular for all people to unite," said Fosbrook. "To get in the capital's face."

"This point of view is a majority," said Robertson.

About 50 students from the University of Massachusetts took the trip to show their solidarity.

"I think abortion rights are really under fire," Christine Ruthoski, co-moderator of UMass VOX: Students for Choice, told The Massachusetts Daily Collegian before the march. "And with this administration, they are close to being lost."

Marchers like Ruthoski believe abortion rights are being weakened through federal and state restrictions and will be at risk if Bush is elected for a second term.

According to the Associated Press, while police estimated that the march joined together between 500,000 and 800,000 people, actress Janeane Garofalo had a different number.

"We've made history with 1,001,500 marchers," she told the crowd after the march. Many organizers said the march was the largest in the nation's history.

Garofalo, a leading comedian, was only one among several celebrities at the march. Ana Gasteyer, a Saturday Night Live comedienne, brought her toddler daughter on stage.

"Francis has recently learned the power of 'no,' " she said referring to her daughter, and turned to ask Francis several questions. "Do you think we should re-elect Bush?"

The crowd, and her daughter yelled an enthusiastic no.

"We are here to ask our government do the right thing," she said. "We have a very serious cause. We are marching for our lives and our daughters' lives."

Familiar faces to the pro-choice movement and actresses Whoopi Goldberg, Susan Sarandon and Cybill Shepherd were also participants.

Hundreds of politicians, including former Democratic presidential candidate Howard Dean and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-NY), hit the pavement and enthused the crowd. Several congressional representatives from New York, California, Arizona, Illinois, Texas and Wisconsin spoke to the crowd.

"We are women, we are strong, and we shall not be moved," shouted Shiela Jackson, a representative from Texas.

The representatives stood in front of 57 international flags. Several international groups were in attendance asserting that damage from Bush's policies is spreading beyond U.S. shores, through measures such as the Holocaust memorial defaced

By Ikaika C. Arnado

The University of Massachusetts Police Department arrested two students early Saturday morning for defacing the Holocaust memorial near the Student Union.

One police officer was injured during the struggle and will be on leave for three weeks. The students arrested were Erik A. Pardee, 19, of 21 Jonathan Judd Cir., Southampton, Mass.; and Kevin J. Crowley, 18, of 11 Anawan Ave., Saugus, Mass. Both were charged with disorderly conduct, destruction of property less than $250, resisting arrest and injury to a religious monument. Both posted bail and are scheduled to be arraigned today at Hadley District Court.

The Holocaust memorial was composed of an assortment of colored flags that each represented 5,000 of the 12 million Jews, Soviet prisoners of war, Polish citizens, Gypsies, disabled persons, Jehovah's Witnesses and homosexuals murdered in Nazi concentration camps. The memorial was scheduled for display from April 19-23. Because of weather conditions, the memorial was rescheduled to be taken down on Sunday.

According to officials from the UMPD, undercover officers spotted Pardee and Crowley at 2:41 a.m. ripping out approximately 60 to 70 flags.

"As soon as the officers saw the subjects destroying the memorial, they directed marked and unmarked cruisers into the area to help apprehend the suspects," Barbara O'Connor, chief of UMass police, said. "As soon as they observed the cruiser they

Community drains, cleans Campus Pond

By Ikaika C. Arnado
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts Comm-unity Water Watch organized a cleanup of the University of Massachusetts Campus Pond on Saturday afternoon to improve the quality of the local watershed.

Chancellor John V. Lombardi; Michael Gargano, the vice chancellor for student affairs and campus life; Selectman Robie Hubley; and Amherst Select-woman Anne Awad briefly spoke at the beginning of the event. All of the speeches emphasized the importance of maintaining clean water.

"If you don't have a significant amount of potable water [and] arable land to grow food on … you're going to be on bad times," Hubley said. "You are not going to have the luxurious life that your parents and I have had."

Approximately 70 people were present at the clean up. Some volunteers wore high-wader boots and trekked though the mud of the partially drained pond to clean out plastic bags, cigarette buts, paper and other man-made debris. One of the volunteers found a classroom chair, some found rubber ducks, and another found a 21-speed mountain bike.

"We got some of the people with high waders to come and pull the bike out," said Rita R. Shaffer, a freshman environmental science student. "It's one of the many things that is floating in the pond."

Other organizations came to help with the pond clean up. Four members from the Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority walked around the pond with plastic bags picking up garbage.

"Earth day was last week so I felt like I wanted to contribute and do something to help out," said Kimberly M. Shea, a sophomore English student and member of Kappa Kappa Gamma.

Local bands Drug Store Cowboys and Busted Vacuum played music to support the environment.

"The Campus Pond is in disrepair and we thought we could bring the ambient atmosphere that is in sync with the vibes of Mother Earth," said Zack Bruce, drummer for Busted Vacuum.

The problem the Campus Pond faces is that droppings from the geese, ducks and swans causes excess nutrient buildup and flow into Lake Warner, the watershed that supplies the water for the Campus Pond. This causes an excess of algae to grow and kill other species.

"The Campus Pond actually is a man-made pond that is a stream, which is a tributary of Lake Warner, which is eutrophying, which means that it has a nutrient imbalance," said Mark Lennon, organizer of the event.

Community leaders feel clean water is very important for the public. Because of environmentalist efforts, residents of Massachusetts can enjoy a higher standard of living.

"Out here in Western Mass., 20 to 30 years ago you wouldn't go near the Connecticut River because of the pollution," State Representative John W. Scibak said. "It's now a very vibrant river; it's one where people swim [and] where people boat. It's great for recreational purposes and I think that's very important for the quality of life."

In a related incident, Edwin Torres, a volunteer at the event, became trapped waist deep in the quicksand-like mud of the partially drained

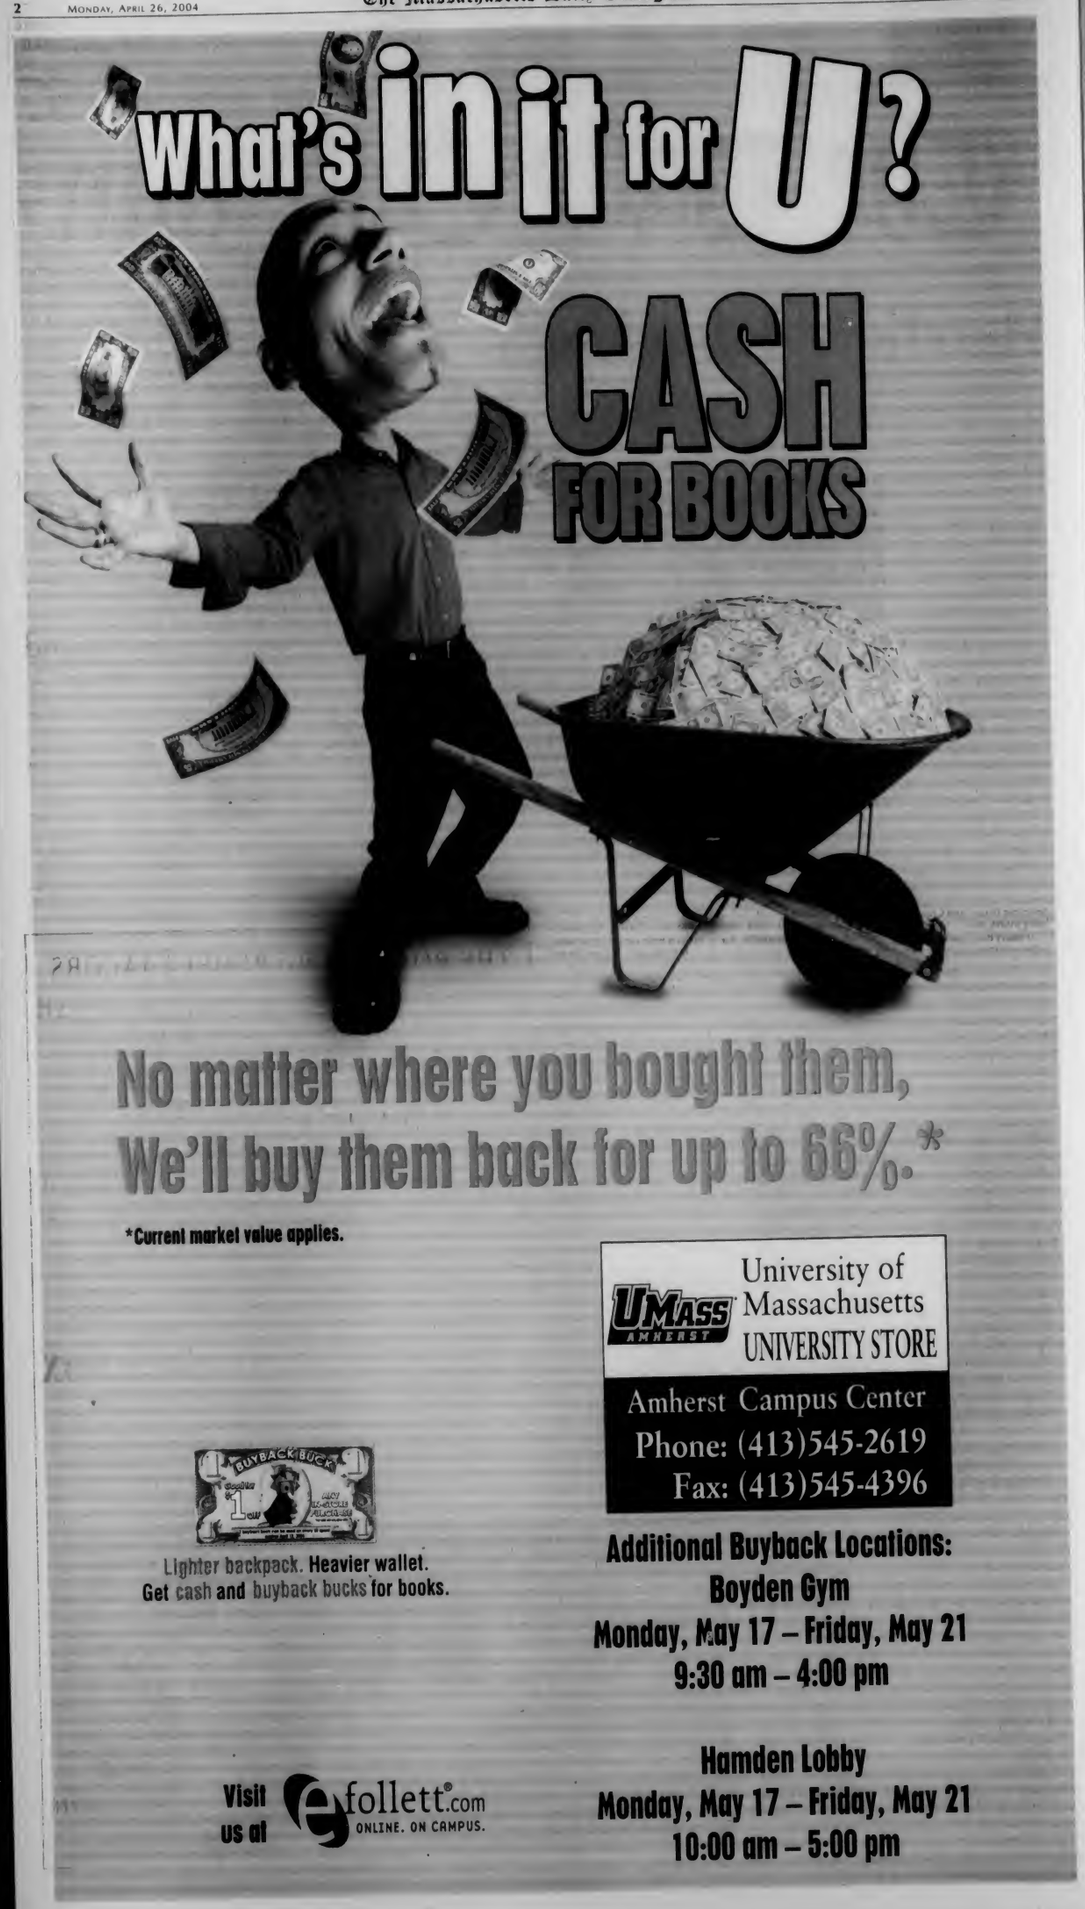
Freshmen Nitya Viswanathan and sophomore Christina Morales, both of Amherst College, volunteered to help clean the Campus Pond, as part of an Earth Day celebration on Saturday. Massachusetts Community Water Watch sponsored the cleanup.

UN plan to unite Cyprus falls apart

By Alex Efty
Associated Press



NICOSIA, Cyprus (AP) — A U.N. plan to reunify the war-divided island of Cyprus collapsed Saturday despite American and European support when Greek Cypriots rejected the proposal in one referendum and Turkish Cypriots endorsed it in another.

That means Cyprus will not join the European Union on May 1 as a united state. Rather, EU laws and benefits will apply only to Greek Cypriots living in the island's south, according to a deal negotiated with European leaders.Cyprus has been split into a Greek Cypriot-controlled south and a Turkish-occupied north since Turkey invaded in 1974 after a coup by supporters of a union with Greece. The breakaway state is recognized only by Turkey, which maintains 40,000 troops there.

The reunification plan was drawn up by U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Richard Boucher said the United States was "disappointed" by the Greek Cypriot vote, calling it a "setback" to those seeking a united Cyprus. Washington had warned of repercussions if the plan was defeated, potentially jeopardizing hundreds of millions of dollars in U.S. aid.

ban on federal money for family-planning groups that promote or perform abortions abroad.

In addition to famous faces, the directing organizers of the event were anything but silent.

"Today we walk with a multitude of Americans," said Anthony D. Romero, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union. "If you believe that the right to choice is a basic human right that no politician can ever sweep away with a pen, walk with us."

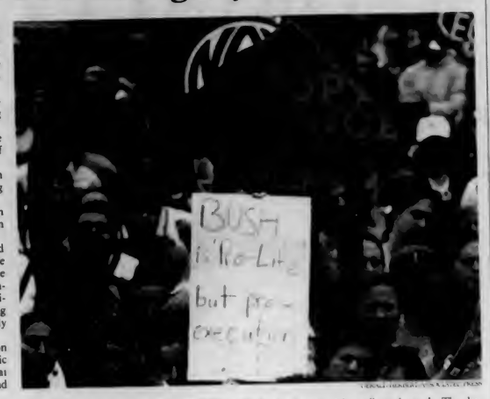
The ACLU was one of seven leading civil rights groups that sponsored the event. It was joined by Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Black Women's Health Imperative, Feminist Majority Foundation, NARAL Pro-choice America, National Latina Institute for Reproductive Health and National Organization for Women.

While marchers in solidarity with these groups held signs reading, "Keep Bush off my Bush" and "Against abortion? Have a vasectomy," they were met with some people in opposition holding signs reading, "Abortion is genocide."

The contingent of anti-abortion advocates stood on the side, some aggressively shouting and displaying photos of dead fetuses, while others smiled and held signs simply reading "pro-life."

A mother in the march comforted her daughter when passing the graphic photos.

"Don't worry," she said. "There are about 5,000 of us for each of them."



One woman displayed a sign reading that abortion was killing Jesus' children.

"Jesus? I don't believe in Jesus," said one marcher. "I'm Jewish!"

According to the Associated Press, police arrested 16 people from the Christian Defense Coalition for demonstrating without a permit and another anti-abortion protester for throwing ink-filled plastic eggs at rally signs.

Though vocal, the opposition had little effect on the enthusiastic marchers. One woman smiled at the anti-abortion advocates, and continued chanting.

"Who says we can't change things, right?" she said to her friend.

Activists rally in in Washington yesterday during an abortion rights rally and march. The day, which focused on protecting women's reproductive rights, included men and women from across the country along with activists from nearly 60 countries.

fled. The officers gave chase and then they ended up apprehending these two subjects."

After a 50-yard chase from the Campus Pond to the Morrill Science Center, the officers struggled with the suspects. During the resistance, officer Luis Antonmarchi tore a muscle in his leg.

"One of the officers, as a result of their resisting, was injured and was taken over to Cooley Dickinson Hospital and treated for a torn muscle and has been referred to a specialist," O'Connor said. "We expect him to be out for at least three weeks."

Police say alcohol was a factor. Lieutenant Robert A. Thrasher, of UMPD, who was present at the time of the arrest, described Pardee and Crowley as being intoxicated.

It hasn't been confirmed if the crime was premeditated or was a random act of violence. Crowley claims it was a random act of delinquency.

"A friend of mine and [I] ... went down and saw the flags and for no reason at all ... we decided to pick up the flags and knock them over," Crowley said. "It was just a delinquent act — it was really just vandalism. We had no idea what the flags stood for."

Crowley also claimed they were not maliciously targeting any particular group.

"We weren't trying to hate Jewish people; we were just bored," Crowley said. "I think it was a dumb decision to do. It just got out of hand."

The University authorities do not tolerate hate crimes. The Holocaust memorial is considered a religious memorial, and defacement of religious sites could constitute such a crime.

"We don't tolerate racist acts, and we don't tolerate anti-Semitic acts or homophobic acts. We don't tolerate violence against women," Larry H. Goldbaum, head of Jewish affairs, said. "This is one of those rare opportunities that we can do more than just talk about it. This is one case where the people who did it are not faceless or nameless — we know who they are, and I think they should take responsibility for their actions."

According to the UMPD, police often keep an eye on symbolic shrines or memorials to protect them from this type of vandalism.

"We attempt to monitor these things for this type of problem. Often times, people will notify us that something is being put up, and they'll ask that the police keep an eye on it," O'Connor said.

Cypriot unification collapses

Greek Cypriots largely objected to limits on the right of Greek Cypriot refugees to return to homes they fled when the island was divided, while allowing tens of thousands of Turkish settlers who arrived after the 1974 invasion by Turkey to remain.

Cypriot President Tassos Papadopoulos said the plan's defeat did not mean that Greek Cypriots were "turning their backs" on Turkish Cypriots.

"They have simply rejected this particular solution for many reasons, but mainly because they did not believe that this solution provides the necessary safeguards for its full implementation," said Papadopoulos, who campaigned against the plan.

"The only real beneficiary of this plan would have been Turkey."

The plan foresaw a federation of two politically equal states — one for the 643,000 Greek Cypriots and one for the 180,000 Turks and Turkish Cypriots — under a weak central government.

It would have reduced the area under Turkish control, requiring entire villages to relocate so houses could be returned to their original Greek Cypriot owners.

The number of foreign troops — 40,000 Turks and 6,000 Greeks — would have been reduced to no more than 1,600 by 2018.

Turkey's government has been pushing for a solution to the island's division, hoping a resolution could improve Turkey's own chances at joining the European Union. The United States, the European Union and others backed the plan.

But official results showed almost 76 percent of Greek Cypriot voters rejected it. About 65 percent of Turkish Cypriot voters supported it.

Greek Cypriot Ioannis Kyriakides, a 55-year-old chemical engineer, said he voted against the plan because it did not guarantee protection against another Turkish invasion.

Turkish Cypriots favored the plan because they saw it as a means to greater prosperity and EU membership. Cem Aydan, a 35-year-old businessman, said he voted for the plan "for the future of my son and for the future of all the children on this side of the island."

Turnouts were at least 88 percent in the south and 87 percent in the north, election officials said.

The U.N. envoy who has conducted the Cypriot negotiations, Alvaro de Soto, said he will close his office on the island. Asked for his reaction to the vote, de Soto said, "I would have to bite my tongue."

Greek Cypriots hardly celebrated the outcome, with about 150 subdued demonstrators gathering in the main square of Greek Nicosia, waving Cypriot and Greek flags.

On the Turkish side of Nicosia, drivers honked horns and waved EU flags in celebration. Supporters and opponents yelled at each other in the main square, and police detained at least four people.

Turkish Cypriot leader Rauf Denktash, the "president" of the breakaway state, was satisfied by the outcome. He campaigned against the plan, saying it would lead to the "extermination" of Turkish Cypriots.

Turkish Cypriot Prime Minister Mehmet Ali Talat, who championed the plan, called on Denktash to resign. Denktash refused.

It took six firefighters, three police officers and a nylon rope to pull him out. Firefighters made many attempts, first trying to shovel him out and then tried pry him out with a stretcher. The vacuum created by the clay-like sediment held Torres tightly.

When Torres was finally pulled free of the mud, the crowd, held back by police tape, applauded Torres and the fire fighters. Torres had no injuries.

The situation had the potential of becoming dangerous, said Chief Barbara O'Connor of the UMass Police Department.

Merit-based aid hurts poorer students

Harvard University recently announced it would pay full tuition to any student who comes from a family that makes less than $40,000 a year. This announcement was met with great enthusiasm. However, not every college and university in Massachusetts can afford to institute such a program. Some must react to the financial hardships that have fallen upon the state.

Most, such as the University of Massachusetts, must face heavy budget cuts and other financial restraints.

A sad reality that goes hand-in-hand with budget cuts is the inevitability of increased fees. Financial aid can be a big help in covering fees — but not when those who get the aid are the ones who can already cover the fees in the first place.

Take, for example, 19-year-old Daniel Biehl, who was accepted at Northeastern University in Boston. Biehl comes from a well-off family with a father making a six-figure salary. He is also a very strong student, with an SAT score of 1210.

Despite his family's comfortable financial situation, Biehl recently received a letter from Northeastern saying that University would cover nearly one third of the tuition cost. The reason for this is that Biehl is the type of student Northeastern wants to attract, someone who will increase the school's "reputation and rankings."

While it makes sense to want to attract the brightest students as possible, "merit-based" financial aid causes those who cannot afford higher education at a great disadvantage. Some may call it a necessary evil, but that does not make it any less fair.

This points to a shift in priority for institutions of higher learner from doing what is best for the students to doing what is best for the image of the school. How a school looks on paper, either in the newspapers or in polls, has become more important than ensuring that every deserving student can get a top-quality college education

"More and more schools have been shifting financial resources from poor kids to well-off kids," said Williams College economist Gordon Winston. "[Universities] are moving away from a real sense of mission and egalitarianism to scrambling for high-quality students so they'll do better in U.S. News."

Studies have shown that merit-based aid is becoming more and more popular across the county. According to the Boston Globe, the amount of aid based on merit handed out more than doubled during the past decade, rising from $1.2 billion in the 1992-93 school year to more than $3 billion in 1999-2000.

This includes aid handed out by both public and private schools. This is in contrast to the amount of need-based aid, which only grew by 60 percent during the same time period. The amount of need-based aid was barely higher than the percentage increase of tuition and fees.

And in 1999, according to the College Board, a student from a family that made at least $83,000 received an average of $662 more in financial aid than a student from a family making less than $31,000.

A key to understanding the reasoning behind this all is the sad but truthful fact that colleges and universities are businesses.

As much as students should be placed first, it simply isn't feasible in this day and age. Institutions of higher education must do what they have to in order to stay operating. And it appears, at least in the case of Northeastern University, that students from poorer families will suffer the consequences.

Ghosts of liberation

Mark Ostroff

In the late 19th century, King Leopold II of Belgium appealed to the international community on the "evil" practice of slavery still being used by Arabs in North Africa. To put an end to this, he sought the support of Europe and the United States, claiming that intervention in the Congo should be a priority. He went to the Berlin Conference selling visions of a civilized Africa, free from tyranny, slavery and war.

In the name of freedom and progress, Belgium under Leopold, had found its "special calling."

To the industrialized world, Leopold would become the bringer of light to the Dark Continent. Under the banner of his sweetly named International Association of the Congo, Leopold had begun to assemble a "coalition," to set up humanitarian, religious, and scientific outposts inside the Congo — the beginning of his vision of a "confederation of free negro republics."

Even the United States supported Leopold in his apparently benevolent endeavors. Under Theodore Roosevelt, Secretary of State Fredrick Frelinghuysen proclaimed, "The Government of the United States announces its sympathy with and the approval of the humane and benevolent purposes of the International Association of the Congo."

Leopold was, according to one writer, "enough to make an American believe in Kings forever."

After announcing the "liberation" of the Congo, by denouncing the Arab slave trade, Leopold started, among other things, a currency system, major infrastructure projects, and even new industries. Belgium, he thought, would get a return on the investment of "liberating" the Africans of the Congo. Using the resources of the region, including the cheap (even free) labor of the people, Belgium would build the "Independent State of the Congo."

When a fair was held in Antwerp in 1897, over one million people came to celebrate Leopold's work in the Congo. To show the extent of success of his "humanitarian" mission, he displayed nearly 300 Congo natives in a makeshift "civilized" village.

Some were playing musical instruments, while others were hailing the King as one newspaper put it "an example of humanity." Africans of the Congo were certainly "better off" under the control of Belguim, rather than under the "evil" dictators of Africa and the Arab slave traders, or so the media of the time claimed.

One year, $120 billion, over 10,000 civilians, over 700 soldiers and one joke by the President later, the people of Iraq are 'better off' than ever before.

The real outcome of Leopold's humanitarian gesture, however, still haunts us today. The "civilized world," in all of its objectivity forgot to mention the extent to which men, women and children were repeatedly held hostage, raped, dismembered and killed. Some "ungrateful" Africans were locked in cages, while others were decapitated and their heads lined up as lawn ornaments for the Belgian elite. All the while, Europe and the United States hailed Leopold for his great efforts in "liberating" the Congo.

The year now is 2003, where President Bush proclaims an "imminent threat" by an "evil" dictator in the Middle East. After a significant amount of evidence of this threat was rendered obsolete — through plagiarism, forgery or outright fabrication — the justification for all-out war rested in the hands of the "liberation." Hence the name, "Operation: Iraqi Freedom." The President even hailed the war as a "global democratic revolution."

Like the idea that Leopold sold at the Berlin Conference, it was flawless — invade Iraq, overthrow their despotic leader, rebuild their cities, sell their oil to cover costs, and then sit back and watch Iraq turn itself into a palm-tree paradise. Those who died, were simply casualties in a war for the liberation of the human spirit, and need not count as a "cost." Victory would be priceless, so thought both Bush and Leopold. Like the Congo, Iraq would be "better off," in the end.

As of now, civil unrest is at an unprecedented high as both Shiite and Sunni tribes are working against the United States. These two groups have been at odds for centuries. In Afghanistan, Sunni Muslims regard the Shiite as "hypocrites." Yet, their animosity against the United States is so strong that they have joined the fight against the U.S. "humanitarian mission." Yet still, Iraq is "better off." One year, $120 billion, over 10,000 civilians, over 700 soldiers, and one joke by the President later, the people of Iraq are "better off" then ever before.

If Leopold were alive today, I wonder what he would say if he got the chance to walk through the city of Kinshasa, formerly known as "Leopoldville," and explain to the people of the Congo that despite a century of misery, famine, and genocide, they were "better off." If President Bush were alive a century from now, would he be able to walk through the streets of Baghdad and explain that Iraq was always "better off?"

"Who cares," right Mr. President? Like he told Bob Woodward when asked about how history will see war in Iraq, "We'll all be dead."

So, sleep well, Mr. President, knowing that you will never have to live to see the work of your poor surgery. While the infection of poverty and animosity spreads for generations, we will never have to face the abomination that will carry on long after us. "We'll all be dead."

Ban in place for a reason

Allison Edles

Three hundred sixty-one photographs were taken of dead soldier's homecomings at Dover Air Force Base in Delaware on Thursday, contrary to the ban the Pentagon has placed on the press against publicizing images of soldier's deaths.

The photographs were taken by the Defense Department. The images were then released on a Web site called the Memory Hole (www.thememoryhole.org). Run by Russ Kick, it is dedicated to fighting the attempts the government makes to retain secrets from the public.

This past year's wars in Iraq and Afghanistan have, unfortunately, brought back many American soldiers' dead bodies. And much like the occurrences of Sept. 11, the issue of what is appropriate to air to the public and what isn't has once again been raised.

The subject of death is tragic and unsettling for many Americans and is better dealt privately in the company of friends and family rather than through the public eye. To publish images of death on a Web site, regardless of whether they are gory war pictures or flag-born coffins, is distasteful and serves only to further accentuate the tragedies rather than honoring their deaths.

Kick had filed a Freedom of Information Act request for his Web site and, after being originally turned down, was granted access by the Air Force Mobility Command. According to Lt. Col. Jennifer Cassidy, an Air Force spokeswoman, the request was reversed because the Pentagon was under the impression that the photographs being taken would be used for historical purposes.

The Pentagon later recognized the AFMC's ruling as a mistake and stands by their original decision made in November 2000 but reiterated in March 2003 when it said "there will be no arrival ceremonies of, or media coverage of, deceased military personnel returning to or departing from" air bases.

The reason behind the prohibition of photos taken of fallen soldiers at military bases is mainly for the deceased's families, and with good reason. While there can be great pride felt for a family member who has died in the line of duty overseas, that is not the primary emotion felt upon hearing of their death.

While there can be great pride felt for a family member who has died in the line of duty overseas, that is not the primary emotion felt upon hearing of their death.

Family and friends want to mourn their loss and, consequently, will find themselves being required to focus on the immediate changes that will undoubtedly take place in their daily lives do to their loved-one's absence. It is very difficult to combat despair, and to blast images of death, whether the bodies are draped in flags or not, doesn't force the families to feel an immediate sense of pride. Feeling pride will come with time naturally, but it is more important to address their current sense of loss.

The Pentagon has also said that private, small ceremonies at the gravesite give proper context to the sacrifices of soldiers and their relatives. Such a statement is true and will bring more honor to the individual deceased.

For an entire nation to mourn the death of fallen soldiers, less emphasis is placed on each person. These brave men and women gave their lives for the betterment of the United States; they each deserve respect. That respect is best given privately amongst close family and friends, rather than on the nightly news.

In the events following Sept. 11, there were news channels broadcasting footage of people jumping out of the towers dozens of stories above the ground. At the time, there was undoubtedly a sense that what was going on was a major event in history and that it was necessary to document every little thing that could be documented for posterity. Upon reflection, it has become apparent the awesome tragedy of that day and to further emphasize the deaths by repeating again and again how they died was not necessary in getting the country to understand the mammoth catastrophe that occurred.

In the world of journalism, it is very important to get the whole story, sparing no minor detail. However, the American people need to be given a little more credit in trusting that they understand how horrible death is without photographers and journalists having to lay out a detailed description. The soldiers that died are deserving of recognition and respect and that can best be achieved privately amongst close family and friends rather than on a Web site for the entire world to see.

Why voting isn't always useless

Jeffrey Napolitano

The University of Massachusetts Student Government Association's elections are here this week — again. Among a minority of the student body, there are strong opinions about each candidate, but the majority, unfortunately, pays about as much attention to UMass elections as they do to national elections. And I can't say I blame them.

Voting is often a useless endeavor. At a national level, there is hardly a difference between candidates, for the two candidates for President of the United States are essentially two people from the same underlying party — the "business" party.

It just so happens that we currently have an administration that is particularly more brutal and averse to democratic forms than usual, but the history over the past couple of hundred years shows that Democrats and Republicans are pretty much on par in their unconditional obedience to the business community and for their disregard for civil rights.

John Kerry isn't going to enable people to escape from poverty or give working people control over their communities, but he is different in that he will likely destroy the economy, environment and other countries more slowly than Bush. While this isn't the most inspiring motivation to vote for Kerry, it will marginally improve the lives of many and possibly save the lives of the people whose countries we won't invade.

That's what's so ironic about the hotly disputed elections at UMass. The institutional power of the SGA, even with its $1.7 million budget, is so marginal, that it doesn't really matter who wins.

The situation at UMass, however, is clearer. On one hand, we have a larger-than-normal group of students who are genuinely excited about a pair of candidates and a picture of the future they present. Eduardo Bustamante and Matt Murphy advocate institutional change and student empowerment and have an idea about how to attain it. Their primary concern, unlike so many SGA leaders, is not to pad their resumes. They want to use the SGA as it is theoretically intended: to concentrate and utilize the power of the student body.

The other candidates represent the typical student government candidates. In keeping with the tradition of political nepotism, Patrick Higgins is the roommate and friend of current president, Jared Nokes. Truthfully, I don't know much about Timothy Daly, but his choice of a running mate certainly isn't a good sign. They represent the aspect of the SGA that Andrew Varnon from the Valley Advocate recently described as "notoriously insular, often dominated by political science students for whom the organization is a testing ground."

We don't need more of the "same old." We don't need student "politicians-in-training." We need leaders — those who are willing and able to organize students toward constructive goals. We need people who are not cowed by the administration, but who seek to challenge its authority.

Students don't vote. Half of the nation's population doesn't vote. Some call it laziness; perhaps to an extent it is, but it's mostly a reasonable response to a bleak situation. It is common knowledge that our politicians are bought and sold, swayed by those with money, and dismissing those without it. The best we can hope for are politicians merely concerned with retaining their office.

On a local level, there is more hope. The further you get from national politics, the more influence the population has in elections. This makes sense: The most powerful positions, such as those in Congress, are heavily swayed and fought over by external sources (like big business, their lobbyists, etc.), whereas less important issues, such as city politics, are less influenced.

At the level of student governments of state universities, there's so little power at stake that outside pressure is nonexistent.

That's what's so ironic about the hotly disputed elections at UMass: The institutional power of the SGA, even with its $1.7 million budget, is so marginal that it doesn't really matter who wins. That's why 85-90 percent of the student body never bothers to vote.

But something new has arisen. The promise of the Bustamante/Murphy campaign is not so that the SGA can carry on "business as usual," but so it can expand its institutional power to be used as it should be used: as a means to focus students' wishes, to organize them, to make student participation, in their own goddamn school, relevant.

Bustamante and Murphy are not the miracle solutions to fix everything wrong with the world — no person or handful of people can effect change alone. But they are the first step. They appear to recognize the power of an involved student body. And they are willing to shake things up.

If they don't win, then I'll rejoin the apathetic masses in their belief in the irrelevance of our institutions. Without the budget and the organizing framework of the SGA, progress will be eminently more difficult to bring about, even by the most enthusiastic students.

If they win, it doesn't mean that the fight for relevance and power is over; it just means it will be raised to the next level. It means students will still have to organize for what they want, but it will done with the support of institutional structure, instead of against it. It means the potential of forming a coalition among all UMass universities, of collectively opposing the ongoing dismantling of higher education in this state.

It means the possibility of focusing resources on people, not political cronyism and profit.

Once that ball gets rolling, once a glimmer of hope and a taste of success is instilled in the hearts and minds of young people, there might be no limit to what we can do.

Remaking the death metal rules

Sitting down with the band

By David Fonseca
Collegian Staff

Musical genres are constantly going through phases, regardless of their popularity or mainstream acceptance. Even in the darkest depths of the underground metal scene, there are clearly recognizable models that are devoutly adhered to. That is, until someone comes along and changes the way we perceive what is possible within the confines of a certain musical form.

Arsis 'A Celebration of Guilt' Willowtip

The history of metal is littered with examples of these types of paradigm shifts. In the early 1990s, two albums came along that would forever change the world of rock's perception of death metal.

Carcass' "Heartwork" and At The Gates' "Slaughter of The Soul" took the basic death metal formula and infused it with a tangible amount of melody. For the first time, the worlds of Iron Maiden and Morbid Angel came together. Melodic death metal was born.

Hordes of great bands from across the world jumped into the fray, releasing soon-to-be classic albums that would in many ways define the sound of underground metal for the next 10 years. Bands like In Flames and Soilwork were even able to cash in on some mainstream success with their expert manipulation of the please-all formula.

However, just like all other musical trends that have come and gone, the scene that was created by a few innovators has sadly become watered down by imitators and those who wanted nothing more than to cash in on proven formula.

The time is certainly ripe for another paradigm shift. Enter Jim Malone and Mike Van Dyne and their brainchild Arsis. Their latest album, "A Celebration of Guilt," is a clear testament to what happens when musicians aware of their influences attempt to go beyond the well-trodden ground of their forefathers.

Comparisons to the progenitors of melodic death metal can be made; however, it is when Arsis drift from the formula that makes this an incredible piece of work.

The melody remains, yes, but at no cost to the downright sinister tone this album is able to set. Track five "Worship Depraved" is remarkable in this regard. The song is instantly catchy, but never gets in the way of the dark atmosphere the band creates.

The backbone of this album is the chemistry between Malone and Van Dyne. Both are Berklee-trained musicians whose virtuosic playing ability allows them to take their music places others could only dream of. More importantly, they understand how to play together.

Not one element of this album overshadows another; each instrument is given plenty of room to breathe to give the album a hefty, layered sound. "A Celebration of Guilt" is undoubtedly a remarkable album that will breathe life into a genre that has been in a creative slump.

Drummer Mike Van Dyne provides the percussion that drives Arsis' music along with fellow Berklee alum Jim Malone.

Recently, Arsis granted The Massachusetts Daily Collegian an interview. The members commented on the roots of the band, the recording of their debut album and the creative influences that spawned the creation of "A Celebration of Guilt."

MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN: How do you feel when listening to the final product?

JIM MALONE: I find it very hard to listen to the final product objectively. By the time the 'A Celebration of Guilt' was complete, Mike [Van Dyne] and I had heard the songs hundreds of times — not to mention the fact that I had written some riffs on the album while attending high school. In other words, some of the material seems 'old' to my ears. I do, however, feel that Mike and I put a lot of work into the release.

MDC: The production does all of the songs justice. Who handled the knob turning on this one? What do you think of the final result?

MIKE VAN DYNE: We recorded all the tracks at a local studio in Virginia called Winter Sound with engineer Bob Gurske. The mixing and mastering was done with Steve Carr at Hit and Run Studios in Rockville, Md. He's an excellent person to work with and knows how to mix metal bands without having the over-processed, over-triggered sounds that are so common with metal production these days. It's important for us to have very clean production quality for our music, but we still want it to sound like a real band and not programmed instruments. I'm very happy with the final result, and I think all the songs came out well.

MDC: You guys seem to draw from a wide range of influences on "A Celebration of Guilt." There are elements of thrash, death, black and melodic death. What was your mindset going into the studio?

MALONE: For the most, I think Mike and I just wanted to make an extreme heavy metal record. We write songs that we can 'get off' on, so to speak. I come up with the general skeleton of the songs. Then Mike and I sit in a rehearsal space for hours and give the songs the 'Arsis' makeover. We just set out to write metal songs with no set sub-genre in mind.

MDC: What bands do you draw influences from?

Van Dyne: Mostly older stuff for me. Lately, I've been listening to Suicidal Tendencies 'Lights, Camera, Revolution' and Bruce Dickinson's solo stuff.

MALONE: My play list is lame. I've been listening to Guns N' Roses, Loudness and a lot of early King Diamond material. I guess listening to this stuff helps remind of why I started playing guitar in the first place.

MDC: Melodic death metal seems to be a burgeoning genre in the American metal underground. Do you think underground metal will ever really find its way to the mainstream, or do you see this as just a passing trend?

MALONE: I'm not good with predictions, but I find it odd that a lot of 'extreme' metal bands are making videos these days. They must be getting airplay somewhere. I think at the least people are once again seeing metal as a genre to be taken seriously. It's about time.

MDC: How did you get into playing music? How long have you been playing?

Malone: I started playing violin at age 10 and picked up guitar about four years later. I suppose I've been practicing/playing guitar for about nine years now. My first record was Twisted Sister's 'Stay Hungry.' It was a present for my fifth birthday.

VAN DYNE: I've pretty much always been into this kind of music, and still have tapes in my collection I've had since grade school. I always wanted to play the drums and used to air-drum to Lars' playing in 'Motorbreath' when I was like 10. I started playing for real when I was 15, so I've been at it for 10 years now.

DC: How did you and Mike get together and decide to start this project?

MALONE: Mike and I met in 1998 while attending Berklee College of Music in Boston. We were good friends, but we did not start playing together until nearly three years later, long after I had left Boston. In 2001 we had the opportunity to record a three-song demo together. This project eventually spawned Arsis. In January 2003, Mike made the move from Boston to Virginia to try to take on Arsis. So far, all is well.

Guitarist and lead vocalist Jim Malone has written most of the material for Arsis.

Cultural night emphases African women

By Adamma Udokwu
Collegian Staff

The African Students Association held its 35th Annual Cultural Night Saturday. This is the second cultural night of this school year; the theme of Saturday night's celebration was "African women." It was a night dedicated to the appreciation and acknowledgement of the hard work and accomplishments of African women.

35th Annual Cultural Night The African Students Association April 24

The show opened with an intro from the hosts and a dance by other members of the ASA. Food and refreshments followed, which included various dishes from the different countries of Africa.

The remainder of the show followed with a skit, a song by two ASA members, dancing by students from University of Massachusetts, Amherst and UMass-Boston students along with a fashion show.

Approximately 300 people attended, including parents, student visitors and students from the Five College area. Many enjoyed the performances and were impressed by the hard work demonstrated in the successful performances.

The performed skit was aimed at emphasizing the nobility of women. It was a fictional story of a woman who felt like she was not being given ample praise from her family for her efforts as a supportive wife and caring mother with a career of her own. The husband soon took notice of this and put together a special day (with the help of his kids) for her. They cooked and served her and expressed their gratitude for the great things she has done. The moral of the story was to love and cherish the special women in your life, because hard work and love from someone should never go unnoticed.

"I think [the show] was a lot better than last semester's; I love seeing all of us African people uniting together for a night of enjoyment," said Anisa Ibrahim, a junior sociology major. "I liked the dances the most; they were organized and very creative."

Decorations for the event included flags of the countries of Africa hanging against the walls, as well as flyers on every table that contained information about the successful story of a woman of Africa.

"The flyers were a great idea," said Luis Medina, a sophomore accounting major. "They gave people some information that they could take home with them and read."

For some of the ASA members, this would be their last cultural night during their undergrad years. However, many vowed to return for cultural nights even after graduation.

Members were very impressed with the turnout.

"This was the best show we have ever had," said Treasurer Phillip Seaton, a junior computer systems engineering major. "It was very organized, and I am happy we gave people a great opportunity to learn about African women."

Burning up the big screen

Denzel's performance shines in 'Man on Fire'

Creasy (Denzel Washington), at right, is hired to protect the daughter of a wealthy businessman named Pite (Dakota Fanning) in the film "Man on Fire."

By Ryan Aubert
Collegian Staff

"Man on Fire" is an action/thriller/revenge movie that is actually smart, dramatic and noteworthy — a novelty in the present-day Hollywood climate of cookie-cutter films with no rooted emotion. Simply put, "Man on Fire" is a great film, a suspenseful ride and a stylistic, wholly new endeavor.

'Man On Fire' Directed by Tony Scott Starring Denzel Washington Dakota Fanning 20th Century Fox Rated R 146 mins. Grade A

Denzel Washington stars as Creasy, former member of a military ops group, and now a lost soul and depressed alcoholic on the verge of suicide. He is hired by wealthy businessman Samuel (Marc Anthony) and his wife Lisa (Radha Mitchell) to protect their daughter Pita (Dakota Fanning). Pita is in endangered because of a recent rash of kidnappings in Mexico City.

The first half of the movie is full of dramatic suspense. The lonesome Creasy arrives at Samuel's hacienda and lives in the guest room with an annoying bird. The intelligent 10-year-old Pita talks up Creasy, much to his dismay. However, he eventually warms up to little Pita and becomes a sort of father figure that truly and deeply cares for her.

All the while, he knows she could be kidnapped at any time, creating very suspenseful moments.

Of course, Pita is eventually kidnapped, but not without Creasy getting shot first. He is restored back to optimum health, but not without vowing to make the people responsible pay for what has happened to Pita. The second half of the movie then decidedly turns into a revenge flick, with awfully shocking moments of violence. The steps Creasy take to attain his vengeance are fanatically extreme. Taint of heart beware.

Just as in "Training Day," for which Washington won an Academy Award, his portrayal of Creasy is maddening and fantastic — walking the fine line between crazy and sane. Fanning's acting is equally wonderful. She is smart, funny and cute. The only dark spot is Anthony, who is better known as a fairly famous Latin pop singer. His acting seems a little forced and perhaps he should have just stayed with his music.

The cinematography style is in line with such movies as "21 Grams" and "Traffic," with certain colors filtered out, while others are more noticeable. The difference though that makes this movie unique is the filming and editing style. There are repeated quick cuts and many jittering shots. There are also usually many angles implemented into one scene. These gritty aspects give the sense of being in the underworld of Mexico City.

Combined, these attributes sometimes feel like you're having an epileptic seizure watching the film. This, seizure quality is both the film's greatest achievement and its biggest flaw. This technique has never really been done before and it intensifies the whole movie. At the same time though, it almost gets to be too much, especially during emotional moments. You end up noticing the technique more than storyline sometimes.

Another refreshing quality of the film is the stylistic use of subtitles. These aren't regular, yellow, boring subtitles that just flash at the bottom of the screen. These subtitles range in location on the screen, font and size. This gives all of the Spanish spoken, combined with the acting, a real sense of drama. On a few occasions, English is even subtitled to further make a point.

This stylistic jaunt of a movie does not have a predictable ending. Sometimes, an ending would seem to be imminent, but the movie still trucked on — with Creasy serving up even more plates of revenge.

Denzel is the "Man on Fire," with a clever cinematic technique that adds to his already great acting. A worthwhile movie ticket all around.

Band blowing the 'Dust' off Northampton

By Bradley Farberman
Collegian Staff

NORTHAMPTON — Think "Music From Big Pink" or Bob Dylan's "Nashville Skyline:" a back porch dream where elder, country gentlemen step softly down dirt roads and able-bodied daughters glean remnants of the harvest. (Neil Young's seminal recording also comes to mind.)

In an affectedness not dissimilar to his forebears, Reid Genauer's craftsmanship invokes this dream, a unique romanticism, typically reserved for artists like Dylan or Young, infuses his work as he barrels forward as a songwriter.

"You're always standing on someone's shoulders," Genauer said. "It's how well you disguise it. How you augment it to add your own flavor."

Following Genauer's departure from popular touring act Strangefolk, the Univeristy of Vermont alumnus formed his Assembly of Dust in 2001. The quintet, rounded out by Percy Hill gurus John Lecesse (bass) and Nate Wilson (keyboards), Groovechild graduate Adam Terrell (guitar) and Moon Boot Lover's Andy Herrick (drums), has taken giant steps since its inception. In its brief tenure, the group has packed clubs all along the East Coast.

Following the Assembly's performance at Pearl Street last week, the members of the band spoke openly on a number of topics, including their collaboration with Betts.

"We loved it, and he's a rock and roll hero," said Genauer. "It felt larger than life. It made me realize my drinks weren't as strong as I thought."

"It made me realize I don't know how to party," Herrick said.

Their on-stage rapport with Betts aside, Genauer lamented that live collaborations often feel forced. Unless, of course, Derek Trucks sits in.

"He's so proficient; it just felt natural," Genauer said.

Other collaborative highlights for the band include Genauer's turn with Phil Lesh and Friends ("Friend of the Devil").

And, consequently, life without rock and roll gets lonely.

"There was this six-month period when I wasn't playing music and I missed the songs," said Genauer, alluding to his exit from the Strangefolk in 2000. "I felt like I was away from a lover."

Likewise, a short hiatus from life on the road can seem like ages. The group's performance at Pearl Street was their first in several weeks.

"Since we're creating new songs, it's so exciting to unleash them on the world," Genauer said. "You feel like you're pregnant with the idea."

And as of this moment, it appears that the baby is Wilson's. Genauer and the pianist share authorship for the bulk of the Assembly's repertoire.

"It's kind of interesting when Reid and I write," said Wilson. "You combine two different things, and you come up with something completely new."

Wilson and Genauer also agreed that their songwriting cooperative has turned out tunes unlike anything they might have written for Percy Hill or Strangefolk, respectively.

"Everyone's got their own musical genetics," Genauer said. "It's a unique outcome."

A unique outcome is in debt to a wide range of influences, perhaps. Admittedly, Wilson's record collection is 99 percent jazz, and you can hear it in his playing. Often, the pianist's style owes more to Herbie Hancock or Les McCann than Steve Winwood or Richard Manuel.

Wilson's jazz leanings aside, the Assembly has about as much in common with Charlie Parker as they do with the boy-band phenomenon. Make no mistake: The Assembly of Dust is an organic rock and roll combo, carrying the torch for groups like The Band and Traffic.

And like those groups, the Assembly knows itself inside and out. The band boasts maturity beyond its years, as each member of the quintet had done time as a touring musician prior to his or her involvement in the Assembly.

"We've all done this for so many years," Herrick said. "Our communication is ridiculous."

And while involvement in projects prior to the Assembly's inception might have hindered lesser musicians, this is not the case for Genauer and his cohorts.

"We don't have any learning curve from previous bands," continued Herrick. "Just the communication." Herrick filled Moon Boot Lover's drum chair for four years; the experience rendied him for his time with the Assembly.

And the Assembly's time is now. Apart from a grueling tour schedule, the band is readying a live album and has plans to enter the studio soon. If its initial release is any indication, its forthcoming records will showcase earnest songwriting and solid musicianship, a marked departure from the evils of FM radio.

"Time is a filter for crap," Genauer said. "And only the good stuff persists." Time should have its hands full trying to filter out the Assembly of Dust.

Minutemen drop second staight game

MEN'S LACROSSE from page 10

"They scored, then we scored right after it, so maybe there's a mental letdown, but it brought us to one goal, they took it off, and when they score it's a two goal swing," UMass coach Greg Cannella said.

Kevin Glenz and Connolly each got good looks with less than two minutes to go, but couldn't take advantage.

AMELIA LINCE/COLLEGIAN

Kevin Glenz (left) scored four goals, but was one of just two Minutemen to score more than once in UMass' 12-10 defeat.

The Minutemen fall to 6-6 on the season, and 1-1 in the ECAC with one conference game to go, hosting Rutgers on May 8. It is UMass's second straight loss.

Glenz matched his previous single-game high with four goals, but Matt Tundo (two) was the only other Minuteman that scored more than once on the day. Bill Schell stopped nine shots on goal, but the Hoyas shot at will the entire game, scoring their 12 goals on 49 total shots.

The Minutemen never trailed by more than four goals, but the closest they got to tying the game down the stretch was on Connolly's EMO goal. The Georgetown defense, which entered the game allowing just over seven and a half goals per game, played well enough to keep the Minutemen at bay, even as they surged to a 3-1 run in the third quarter.

"There were times on that sideline when we were looking at each other, trying to figure out what we could do defensively to slow them down a little bit," Georgetown coach Dave Urick said. "We played some zone, we played some man-to-man. They put our defense on their heels. We bent a little bit, but we came up with some plays when we needed them."

The bend-but-don't-break GU defense frustrated the Minuteman attack, which was alternately hot and cold all day. Sean Morris provided plenty of opportunities for the Minutemen, with a goal and four assists in a performance that all but certainly showed that he has fully recovered from the bout with mononucleosis, which kept him out of the first four games of the season.

Still, Morris and Glenz weren't enough to push the offense past the Hoyas, who were organized and energetic throughout.

"You use a lot of energy, crawling back in the game," Cannella said. "Georgetown's an outstanding team, so when you use that energy to get to that spot where we got close a couple of times, they used the bodies that they have to push ahead another goal, so it's very frustrating for our guys."

Varsity eight win leads UM to title

Under Dietz, the varsity eight has lost only one race at the A-10 Championships since the program's inauguration in 1995.

The second varsity eight came within two seconds of duplicating the success of its counterpart, but was edged out by Rhode Island by a time of 7:01.0 to 7:02.8. Katie Freeley and Faith Miller led the Minutewomen from the three and four seats respectively, while senior captain Kate Bonner added power at stroke. Coxswain Jodi Laub guided Laura Hutchinson at the bow, Naomi Rudov, Katie Berger, Gabrielle Papineau and Melissa Stewart.

A victory from the varsity four came as a pleasant surprise to assistant coach Katy Ostertag, who saw freshman Lindsay Price steer the boat to victory in her first varsity race of the season. The novice coxswain was joined by UMass varsity swimmers Jay Yankowski and Megan Pittman, as well as Kate Grogan and Ann Roberts.

UMass secured the title by blowing away the competition by 26 seconds in the varsity quad event. The winning boat was comprised of varsity eight stand-ins Lea Jakobsen, Katie O'Brien, Faith Harkins, and Cat Gariepy.

"UMass is a sculling school, the other teams just couldn't match our speed," Dietz said in reference to the large margin of victory.

The Minutewomen entered the championship ranked 19th in the country by the Collegiate Rowing Coaches Association poll, its highest ranking since 1999.

"I don't think the [A-10 Championship] will effect out ranking but we should move up anyway," Dietz said.

After next weekend's dual meet against Syracuse and Villanova, UMass will look to repeat last year's gold medal performance at the ECAC Championships on May 8 and 9. Impressive performances will likely earn the Minutewomen a bid to the NCAA Championships.

Rams end weekend sweep with 14-run romp

"We should have had better pitching and we should have had better performances from our entire staff and we pretty much didn't get it," Stone said.

Fordham put together a six-run third, making the game 12-0. Fordham didn't score again until the sixth, when it tallied its final two runs of the game.

The Minutemen's lone score was a home run off the bat of senior third baseman Matt Reynolds in the sixth inning. Reynolds had the best game for UMass, going 2-for-4 including the one-out round-tripper. The home run was Reynolds's fourth on the year, tying him for the most on the team with Frank Curreri.

"That kid just never lets down for us. If we had nine to 12 guys like Matt Reynolds on this team we would be on top of the league, no problem," Stone said.

In Saturday's double-header, staff ace Eric Chown pitched a complete game, scattering eight hits throughout the contest. Chown let up four runs in the game, but only one was earned.

Both teams scored two runs in the first inning, but the Minutemen could only score once more in the game. UMass had six hits against Fordham's John Baco, who also pitched a complete game.

Leading the way for the Minutemen was senior shortstop Mike Athas, who went 1-for-3 in the game, knocking in one RBI. Athas had three hits and three RBIs in Saturday's double-header.

The second game lacked any of the pitching prowess displayed in the first. UMass pitcher Matt Torra pitched 4-2/3 innings, letting up seven runs, four of which were earned. Fordham starter David Rodriguez didn't fare much better as he let up eight runs over four innings.

It was Rams reliever Shingo Mitsumori that ended up silencing the Minutemen offense. Mitsumori only allowed one run the rest of the way while UMass relievers Scott Ratliff and Devin Barnett gave up seven combined.

SoccerFest finale is a draw

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

Dozens of goals were scored yesterday at the New Balance SoccerFest, as soccer players of all ages battled it out on the practice fields alongside the Mullins Center.

It was the main event, however, that exhibited how to play perfect defense.

The Massachusetts soccer team and Rutgers played to a 0-0 tie in an exhibition game that gave an early glimpse at what the two northern teams have in store for the fall. UMass coach Sam Koch was pleased with how the day went and the turnout for Minutemen's game.

Rutgers	0

"It's a fun game. It's a great game to have in the spring. Sports Management does a good job putting this on and getting the word out," Koch said. "Last year, it was a great crowd for North Carolina, and this year it was a great crowd for Rutgers. You just can't complain about that."

Although the spring exhibition game isn't always a good measuring stick for a team's talent, one thing was blaringly obvious.

UMass has a very solid defense.

Chris Camerota, Tim Kitchell, Ian O'Donnell and Tyler Pagano headed up the speedy back-line for the Maroon and White, and thwarted any effort that the Scarlet Knights could muster.

Backing up this aggressive defense was the goaltending tandem of Nick Billman and Colin Burns. Billman minded the net for the first half and was relieved by Burns in the second. Koch says the keepers are interchangeable and is happy with how they have performed this spring.

"They both keep on getting better and better. Colin is playing very very well. Billman has struggled a little bit lately, but he's been money for a lot of the spring. He's a gamer," Koch said. "The two of them just roll off each other and make each other better."

One thing that had Koch concerned was whether or not his offense was on the same page. Although the Minutemen were shut out, Koch wasn't discouraged and was impressed by the way the group clicked when push came to shove.

"They didn't click, but they set up some chances, which is what we wanted to do. We didn't finish when we had opportunities; we hit the post a few times," Koch said, "I think we blew a couple of good chances but it's good because created more chances than we have. It's getting there but we still have a ways to go."

The closest chance came late in the first half when Ernie Billittier brought the ball in the box, juked a Scarlet Knight defender, and was slide tackled from behind, awarding the Minutemen with a penalty kick. Oral Bullen shot a bullet but Rutgers keeper Lubos Ancin deflected it aside.

Freshmen played a huge roll in Koch's game plan yesterday as a bulk of team now consists of first-year players, including Billman, the starting keeper.

"We're going to make young mistakes; we made mistakes today. Every game they get better, we had six or seven freshman starters on the field at all times," Koch said.

More than enough

Hoyas hold on to lead, drop UM

By Andrew Merritt
Collegian Staff

WASHINGTON — Ten goals was enough to beat all but one opponent the Minutemen faced prior to Saturday's game at Georgetown. Other than Albany, which scored 11 in the Minutemen's March 16 loss to the Great Danes, no team on the UMass schedule has scored more than nine goals in a game.

On Saturday, however, 10 wasn't enough, as the No. 7 Hoyas edged the Minutemen, 12-10 at Harbin Field.

UMass	10
G'Town	12

UMass jumped out to an early 2-0 lead, but after Walid Hajj scored the first of his three goals at 7:31 to tie it up at two apiece, the Hoyas (8-2, 2-0 Eastern College Athletic Conference) never trailed, and clinched a share of the ECAC title.

Hajj also scored the game winner, earning the hat trick with a bounce shot off a feed from Neal Goldman that snatched away all the momentum the Minutemen had built with a brief three-goal run.

A loose stick doomed the UMass streak, as Chris Doyle's pretty goal with 1:38 to go in the third quarter was disallowed when his stick was challenged, and the pocket was ruled too deep. Not only was the goal nullified, but Doyle was sent off for a non-releasable one-minute penalty.

Just 28 seconds later, Hajj scored the Hoyas 11th goal, and the Minutemen couldn't recover. Ryan Connolly scored an extra-man goal on a low sling with 7:29 to go in the fourth, but Georgetown's Peter Cannon answered with a high hard shot off another Goldman feed one minute later, capping off the day.

See MEN'S LACROSSE on page 8

Nick Miaritis, left, tries to elude UMass midfielder Greg Scott during Saturday's 12-10 Georgetown victory. Miaritis scored two goals and added an assist, as the Hoyas improved their Eastern College Athletic Conference record to 2-0, and their overall mark to 8-2. UMass fell to 6-6 overall (1-1 ECAC).

Rowing wins ninth straight conference title

By Matt Barstow
Collegian Staff

It wasn't pretty. It definitely wasn't easy. But the Massachusetts women's crew team managed to capture its ninth consecutive Atlantic 10 title on Saturday.

A strange day on Cooper River in Collingswood, N.J. began when Rhode Island was caught stacking its novice boats with veteran rowers in an effort to topple the perennial champion Minutewomen. The illegal move resulted in the disqualification of Rhode Island's novice four and novice eight-A boats. Had the Rams not been stripped of their points, they would have gone home with the title.

The drama began when rowers from Duquesne noticed a familiar face sitting in the three-seat of Rhode Island's novice boats. The face was that of a Duquesne transfer, currently a member of Rhode Island's second varsity eight crew. Since the rower had a year's experience with Duquesne during the 2003 season, she was not eligible to race as a novice. After Duquesne filed a grievance with officials, UMass was awarded the title.

With Rhode Island out of its way, UMass cruised to victory with wins in the varsity eight, varsity four and varsity quad competitions.

Massachusetts won the regatta 42-33 over Rhode Island, while Saint Joseph's finished third (23) and George Washington fourth (24). Dayton rounded out the top-five after placing second in three races and picking up 20-points. Fordham edged out Temple by one-point for sixth, 14-13, thanks in large part to a third-place finish by its varsity four.

Duquesne qualified for the finals in three events but went on to loose two of the three races, resulting in the Dukes tying novice four winning La Salle for last-place. The two basement dwellers collected nine points apiece.

The UMass varsity eight finished the day's highest scoring race in 6:43.0, edging second-place GW by less than seven seconds. Senior coxswain Carrie Champigny led the boat to victory with help from Faith Harkins and Cat Gariepy from the one and two seats, respectively. Lea Jakobsen sat in the six-seat while Katie O'Brien occupied the four. Also part of the crew was Hayley McGrath at stroke, Lizzy Boyle, Lauren Cromwell and Stephanie Hopf.

"The varsity eight showed speed like I've never seen before. I think they rowed the fastest 500 to start a race that I've ever seen from them," said coach Jim Dietz, who after the race was named the A-10 Coach of the Year for the sixth time in eight years.

Fordham is Ram tough at Lorden

By Bob McGovern
Collegian Staff

Baseball is a sport that can change drastically from week to week. One injury, miscue or bad pitch can tweak the momentum just enough to send a team spiraling in the wrong direction.

The Massachusetts baseball team was struck by all three this weekend and was swept by Fordham for the first time ever at Earl Lorden Field.

UMass dropped a close 4-3 match on Saturday in the first game of a double-header, which was followed by a 14-9 defeat. Then on Sunday, everything that could go wrong did, as the Minutemen were demoralized 14-1 by the Rams, much to the dismay of UMass coach Mike Stone.

"They just beat us in every category," Stone said. "They outplayed us. They were more competitive. They pitched better. They hit better, obviously. I hope we didn't have anybody that quit on us, but I've got question marks about that."

Keith Doherty was on the mound for UMass on Sunday and could not figure out any way to slow down the Fordham offense. In 2-1/3 innings Doherty gave up eight runs, seven earned, and seven hits.

Fordham catcher Jeremy Bourgeois got things started for the Rams with a three-run home run in the first inning. Bourgeois went 3-for-5 in the game and had five RBIs. Fordham mustered one more run on the inning but its offense was far from finished.

In the next inning the Rams made it 6-0 when with one out Doherty walked outfielder Timothy Short, who was then singled to second by Greg Smith. Fordham's big bat, Kurt Thomas, walked to load the bases, and Joe Ciccone (2-for-6, 4 RBIs) singled, scoring Short and Smith, making it a 6-0 game.

Sweeps week: Sox take 3

NEW YORK (AP) — Six months later, Pedro Martinez and the Boston Red Sox held on against the Yankees and completed a weekend blowout in the Bronx.

Martinez pitched seven crisp innings and Manny Ramirez hit a two-run homer off Javier Vazquez, leading the Red Sox to a 2-0 win Sunday and their first series sweep of New York since 1999.

Yankees	0

Boston, the AL East leader, took three in a row at Yankee Stadium and extended New York's losing streak to a season-high four. Despite a record $183 million payroll, the listless Yankees left their booing fans to wonder when all those heralded All-Stars will start justifying their stratospheric salaries.

New York, which has won six straight division titles, fell 4? games back of the AL East lead for the first time since May 10, 2002, according to the Elias Sports Bureau. At 8-11, the Yankees are three games under .500 this late in the season for the first time since they had the same record on April 22, 1997.

Catcher Jorge Posada dropped a pair of foul popups, shortstop Derek Jeter made a throwing error, and Jeter and Hideki Matsui let David Ortiz's pop down the left-field line drop between them for a double. The Yankees, in a season-long funk, were batting an AL-low .221 coming in and managed just four hits in losing to the Red Sox for the sixth time in seven games this year.

Jeter, overmatched against Martinez, went 0-for-4 with three strikeouts overall and extended his hitless streak to a career-high 25 at-bats, prompting boos from the sellout crowd of 55,338. Bernie Williams went 0-for-4, dropping his slide to 2-for-26.

On a cloudy, drizzly afternoon, "Let's Go Red Sox!" chants could be heard from the stands.

How different it was last October, when Martinez failed to hold a 5-2, eighth-inning lead in Game 7 of the AL championship series, and New York won the pennant on Aaron Boone's 11th-inning homer off Tim Wakefield. And Boston has spurted to the quick division lead despite missing shortstop Nomar Garciaparra and outfielder Trot Nixon, who haven't played this season because of injuries.

Martinez (3-1), using a biting breaking ball, improved to 10-8 lifetime against the Yankees. He allowed four hits, struck out seven and walked one.

Scott Williamson finished with hitless relief for his first save, completing Boston's first sweep of New York since Sept. 10-12, 1999.

Manny Ramirez's two-run home run was all Pedro Martinez (four hits, seven strikeouts, one walk) needed to finish off the Red Sox' three-game weekend sweep of the Yankees in New York.

Bird's Pacers finish off C's

By Jimmy Golen
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — Larry Bird was back in Boston for a familiar result: A playoff victory.

Bird watched from the stands while Ron Artest scored 22 points to help Indiana beat Boston 90-75 on Sunday for a sweep in the best-of-seven series. Jermaine O'Neal scored 18 to help Indiana earn its first victory in a playoff series after three consecutive first-round losses.

Pacers	90
Celtics	75

Paul Pierce's dejection is evident during Boston's elimination.

"This was one of our goals: to get out of the first round. And we did that," said Rick Carlisle, whom Bird picked to coach the Pacers after the Celtics Hall of Famer took over as president of basketball operations. "We're the first team to advance, so we're very proud of that."

The Pacers will have more than a week to rest before the Eastern Conference semifinals, where they will play the winner of the first-round series between Miami and New Orleans. The Heat have a 2-1 heading into Game 3 on Tuesday.

Reggie Miller was 4-for-8 from 3-point range for 14 points, hitting a pair of 3s early in the third quarter to help the Pacers open a 17-point lead.

"The younger players on this team feel obligated to go out and get a ring for Reggie," the 25-year-old O'Neal said of the team's 38-year-old elder statesman. "We know he doesn't have many more attempts left."

Paul Pierce had 27 points and 11 rebounds and Mark Blount had 21 and 13 for the Celtics, who went away meekly for the third time in the series.

"I really have a bad taste in my mouth," Pierce said, noting that the Celtics were swept in the second round last year by New Jersey. "This is really not a fun feeling."

The loss — just the third four-game sweep in Celtics playoff history — could signal the end for interim coach John Carroll, who took over when Jim O'Brien resigned Jan. 27. Carroll lost 12 of his first 13 games but managed to eek out the last playoff spot in the East with a record that was 10 games under .500.

"I've been a coach my whole life, and when you are a coach you understand that coaching is a very precarious job," Carroll said. "I hope I have represented this franchise and the city of Boston over the last 40 games and the players in the way they should be."

Patriots end draft with some offense

FOXBORO (AP) — The New England Patriots added a pair of big-name offensive playmakers Sunday, selecting Arkansas running back Cedric Cobbs and Florida State split end P.K. Sam on the second day of the NFL Draft.

The Patriots took Cobb and North Carolina free safety Dexter Reid in the fourth round, and added Sam with their fifth-round pick. They selected Illinois cornerback Christian Morton in the seventh round with their final pick.

The defensive-minded Pat-riots used five of their eight picks on defensive players, and according to coach Bill Belichick, drafted more for value at the respective draft position than need.

That's a luxury the defending Super Bowl champions can afford.

"I think our draft went pretty well overall," Belichick said. "I feel like we got younger and faster on defense, and offensively I feel like we got good value at the skill positions."

The 6-foot, 221-pound Cobbs, the 128th overall pick, was one of the biggest names left on the board. He was one of the nation's top recruits coming out of high school, and was named MVP of the Cotton Bowl as a freshman in 1999. But he was redshirted the following season after injuring his right shoulder, and didn't earn a full-time starting job until 2003.

Cobbs made the most of the opportunity, as he rushed 1,329 yards on 5.8 yards per carry and scored 10 touchdowns en route to earning first-team All-SEC honors.

He performed well in big games, rushing for 169 yards against co-national champion LSU and 141 yards in a 27-14 win over Missouri in the Independence Bowl.

Cobbs will challenge for playing time on special teams, including kick returns, with newly acquired Corey Dillon expected to start at tailback. Cobbs fell to the second day of the draft largely because of past character issues and concerns about his durability, and though he said he was "a little bit heartbroken" initially about being picked so late, falling to the Patriots might have been a blessing in disguise.

"I know I had issues in the past, but I got over that a long time ago," said Cobbs. "I'm looking towards the future ... Hopefully I can reach my goal to be one of the best backs in the NFL, and I have a great opportunity in New England."

The 5-foot-10, 203-pound Reid, the 113th overall pick acquired by the Patriots in the Tebucky Jones trade, was a consensus All-Atlantic Coast first team selection as a senior in 2003 after leading the Tarheels with 132 tackles, 95 of which were solo. He started 36 straight games for North Carolina during the past three seasons and finished his career with 466 tackles, four forced fumbles, two fumble recoveries and three interceptions.

Student government elections to begin tomorrow

Three presidential candidates address top priorities and proposals

Courtesy Emilie Duggan

Brian Long

Asserting that UMass lacks a strong sense of community within the student body and between the students, faculty and staff, Brian Long aims to build that community and school spirit through improvements to the Greek community, athletics and fine arts. He suggests that an outdoor spring concert would be a great way to bring even more students to one of the biggest events of the year.

Long believes that the recommendations made by the Alcohol Task Force do nothing to help curb the problem of alcohol abuse on campus, and in some cases would actually increase the problem. He feels that the way to change the culture of abuse on campus is to increase education through programs, workshops, and other events, something that he says the Alcohol Task Force failed to do.

Long argues the General Physical Education program — a program he benefited students in multiple ways and cost less per year than what some administrators make — should never been cut. He believes the SGA and the administration can come up with a compromise that would bring back the program at some point.

Scott Ferguson/Collegian

Patrick Higgins

Patrick Higgins's number one goal is to reconnect with students. He is advocating for campus-wide programming, and for having a spring concert outside through Registered Student Organizations. He believes student government needs to do a better job maintaining students' rights by fighting the dry campus concept and parental notification.

Higgins says improving academic advising is also important. He believes that students not graduating in four years is a problem, and that the SGA needs to invest in the people who help students get through in four years and provide the one-on-one relationships that are currently lacking.

Making parking more affordable for undergrads is necessary, Higgins says. He believes that undergraduates should be paying a cheaper rate, especially considering that parking has not improved recently and the total population of campus is growing.

Courtesy Emilie Duggan

Eduardo Bustamante

Eduardo Bustamante argues the SGA needs to be reconnected with the students. He is proposing what he calls "democracy for real," with reform and a fundamental change in how the SGA derives its legitimacy. He says that this will happen through bi-weekly community meetings in each residential area.

Bustamante plans to advocate for four academic credits per class. He says that the University's current three credits per class system forces students to scramble more and learn less. By switching to four credits, he argues, there will be less students per class, better class availability and classes will become more focused, more efficient and students will learn more.

He pledges to support diversity and stop the attack on the issues that affect ALANA students. Assuring the Office support programs and adequate funding, and resolving to abolish the SEVIS fee for international students are priorities. He says he also would like to extend the resources of advocacy agencies to support gender oriented, Gay, Lesbian, Bi-sexual and Transgender, and special needs groups.

Bustamante believes that students have lost many things that they once had. As a body renewed in solidarity, he argues that the administration will get those things back. He asserts that students will have physical education again, English as a Second Language will be brought back to its former capacity, there will be free printing in the library and affordable parking will be brought back.

Five referendum questions on ballot

By Melissa Blanksteen
Collegian Staff

Five referendum questions will appear on this week's special election ballots, all proposed by President Jared Nokes.

The first asks if students would approve $4 of student fees to be allocated to the Collegiate Readership Program, which brings free New York Times, Boston Globe and USA Today newspapers to students.

Nokes said that students approved of the program last fall, but the program asked for some funds from the administration. The administration has refused to fund it.

The second question asks if students support the Commonwealth College program.

"The candidate [Eduardo Bustamante] who had the most votes in the last elections articulated a desire to eliminate Commonwealth College," Nokes said. "It is such a large issue that we should get the students' input ... just advocating for it harms the whole program."

Bustamante said he has made no such claim.

Online voting is the third question. Nokes said that students have approved of this before but he said he wants conformation that students still want it in light of the recent election problems.

The last two questions ask students if they want a new agency to be created for advocating for broader diversity issues, and if the Office of ALANA Affairs should become a part of such an agency.

"There has been a request for years," Nokes said.

He said that all of these questions deal with key issues that the Senate has not been able to solve this year. He also said that he did not ask for any input on these questions.

The special elections will be held tomorrow and Thursday. Students can vote at all the Dining Commons and at the Campus Center Concourse from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. and again from 4 p.m. to 7 pm. Instant Run Off Voting will not be used, instead the ballots will be more traditional.

A look at roles of the SGA

By Melissa Blanksteen
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow and Thursday, University of Massachusetts Amherst students will be able to vote again for president, trustee and area government.

Yet, for many students, these positions are unclear.

"The job of president and trustee are the two most important student leadership positions on the campus," current trustee Hannah Fatemi said in an email. "For they are the official voice of the student body."

Currently, Jared Nokes holds the position of president on an interim basis. The presidential term on a normal year runs from April 1 until March 31. The trustee position starts July 1 and ends June 30.

The president represents the 18,000 undergraduates on campus to the administration. He or she has a seven member executive cabinet which helps advocate for students' needs.

"It is the job of the president is to meet with members of the administration to discuss issues that concern the student body as well as keep the student body informed of issues and news," Fatemi wrote.

As for trustee, there are five student trustees, one from each of the UMass campuses. Two get to vote each year, and that rotates from year to year among the campuses.

Fatemi said all the student trustees also sit in on committees, "such as the Committee on Academic and Student Affairs or the Committee on Finance and Audit," she wrote.

The Board itself meets five times a year when they vote on the committees' proposals.

"However, the job of the student trustee does not end with meetings with the Board of Trustees," Fatemi wrote. "The student trustee serves as a resource person for the SGA, meets regularly with several members within the administration and serves on several on-campus committees, to further advocate for and represent the students on campus."

These positions are also life-changing, according to Seth Avakian, who was student trustee from 1999 to 2001.

"The position changed the focus of my life from politics. I was a political science major, to education," he said in an e-mail. "I finished my masters in higher education administration in 2002."

He said he found the position frustrating and "a difficult balancing act because you have to represent the needs [and] beliefs of the students in a [way] that the board will listen."

Currently, he runs a residence hall of 650 first year students at the University of California Santa Barbara, and he says he also spends time surfing.

Fatemi said she can't stress enough the important of incoming experience for the positions.

"It's one thing to have great ideas on how to improve student life here on campus, but it is vital to have experience and knowledge of how the University works before one enters into the position to get things done," she wrote.

'Take Back the Night' starts tomorrow

By Michelle Rivera
Collegian Staff

For the second straight year, hundreds of Five College students and community residents will gather on the University of Massachusetts campus this week in an effort to raise awareness about sexual assault and violence against men and women.

The annual event, called "Take Back the Night," will include activities on the UMass campus both tomorrow and Thursday night.

"Take Back the Night's" first night of activities will kick off tomorrow at 7 p.m. with a speak-out that will take place at the Campus Pond. The speak-out is designed to provide an opportunity for the survivors of violence to share their stories, and for supporters to listen. It will also provide a voice to those who feel silenced by society.

"This event is not associated with victims," said Cara Bedick, co-coordinator of the event. "The night is about survivors and supporters who are making a change."

Everywoman's Center counselor advocates and educator advocates will be on hand during the evening marked with reflective arm-bands to serve as resources for anyone who needs them.

The event will continue for a second night on Thursday where participants will march together to reclaim the night as a time of safety and as a time to increase awareness of the prevalence of violence, and specifically sexual violence in our community.

Thursday's march will begin at the Student Union at 7 p.m., and end in a rally at the conclusion of the marching, featuring select speakers who make it part of their lives to put an end to violence. According to the press release, the rally not only serves as a time for education, but for celebration as well.

"By speaking frankly about the problems of sexual assault and violence, we can start to make a difference," said Julia Kristan, co-coordinator.

"It's a problem no one can deny," she said. "By coming out and supporting the rally, you're doing something."

The rally will end with donated Coca Cola and Campus Catering refreshments and positive music supplied by UMass' own WMUA 91.1 FM.

The event is being organized by a small group of students who have been meeting every Wednesday since the beginning of the semester.

One of the co-sponsors for both events is VOX: Students for Choice, an existing group designed to educate the university community about reproductive health and rights, to translate increased awareness into pro-choice activism on campus and to serve as a coalition partner to state, national and international reproductive rights efforts. The Everywoman's Center, the women's studies department and WMUA 91.1 FM are also sponsors.

Mass. school funding unfair

By Ken Maguire
Associated Press

BOSTON (AP) — A judge ruled yesterday that Massachusetts still is short-changing lower-income students and recommended the state's highest court force education officials to pay what could be hundreds of millions of dollars more to fix the problems.

The advisory ruling by Superior Court Judge Margot Botsford in a lawsuit filed by 19 districts sets the stage for the Supreme Judicial Court to again dictate the future of education in Massachusetts. If the high court agrees, it could radically change the way the state spends money to educate its nearly one million public school students.

A 1993 SJC ruling said the state hadn't met its constitutional duty to fund schools, and led to passage of the Education Reform law, which overhauled how schools are funded. Since then, Massachusetts has spent nearly $31 billion on schools, mostly in lower-income districts.

But in her 358-page report, Botsford said the state "does not presently provide sufficient funds" to plaintiff districts to pay for special needs children, reasonable class sizes, technology and good libraries, among other things.

"What Judge Botsford has done, in short, is to say to the state, 'It is time to get the job done,'" said plaintiffs' attorney Michael Weisman, who called the ruling a "spectacular victory."

Botsford recommends the state start schooling children — particularly those categorized as low income, special needs and English language learners — earlier than kindergarten.

New look for $50 bill

WASHINGTON (AP) — Touches of red, blue and yellow are being added to the new $50 bill, the second of the green-backs to be colorized as part of an effort to thwart counterfeiters.

The subtle colors, which appear in parts of what was once the cream-colored background on the note, are the most noticeable change on the new $50, which was unveiled yesterday by the Treasury Department's Bureau of Engraving and Printing, makers of the nation's paper currency.

The new bills are still the same size and use the traditional black ink on the front and green ink on the back. They also still feature Ulysses S. Grant on the front and the U.S. Capitol on the back. But the borders around Grant — the Civil War general and 18th U.S. president — and the Capitol have been removed.

The new $50 also features subtle background colors of red and blue on both sides.

Washington

liberal justices criticized

WASHINGTON (AP) — Two of the Supreme Court's most conservative members delivered an unusual public rebuke to more liberal justices yesterday, accusing them of ducking an important church-state fight over mealtime prayers at a taxpayer-funded military college.

Justice Antonin Scalia, joined by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, said the court should have taken the case to answer for the first time whether its ban on school-sponsored prayer for young children and high school-ers applies to college students as well.

Scalia delivered a polite but blunt critique of what he suggested are flimsy reasons for avoiding an appeal on behalf of the Virginia Military Institute, which is part of the state's university system.

The VMI case also gave the court an opportunity to rule on the constitutionality of traditional religious observance in military institutions, Scalia said.

Washington State

Jewelers protested

SPOKANE, Wash. (AP) — Those gleaming necklaces, rings and watches in the jewelry case may cost a lot more than you think, environmentalists say.

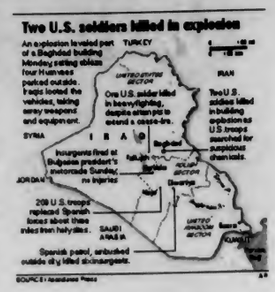
In a new public relations campaign, environmentalists groups are scolding jewelers for the damage caused by mining for gold, silver and other precious metals, and are putting pressure on jewelry retailers to reject minerals from big polluters.

One gold ring, conservationists say, generates 20 tons of mine waste. This year, they passed out Valentine's Day cards reading, "Don't tarnish your love with dirty gold" in front of jewelry stores in New York, Boston and Washington, D.C.

The campaign caught the attention of Tiffany & Co., which took out a recent ad in The Washington Post that said a proposed mine under the Cabinet Mountains wilderness of Montana is a poor way to fill its jewelry cabinets on Fifth Avenue.

In the World

Iraq



Explosion kills two soldiers

BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) — A workshop believed to be producing chemical munitions exploded in flames yesterday moments after U.S. troops broke in to search it, killing two soldiers and wounding five. Jubilant Iraqis swarmed over the Americans' charred Humvees, waving looted machine guns, a bandolier and a helmet.

Brig. Gen. Mark Kimmitt did not say what sort of chemical agents were suspected of being supplied to insurgents from the Baghdad warehouse. After the blast, there was no sign of precautions against chemicals. "Chemical munitions could mean any number of things," including smoke grenades, he said.

In Fallujah, U.S. troops came under a heavy insurgent attack a day after U.S. officials decided to extend a cease-fire rather than launch a full-scale offensive on the city. One Marine and eight insurgents were killed.

Marines battled Sunni guerrillas around a mosque in Fallujah's Jolan district, a poor neighborhood where insurgents are concentrated. Helicopter gunships joined the battle.

Israel

Three Palestinians killed

JERUSALEM (AP) — Mahmoud Zahar, a 53-year-old Egyptian-trained physician who's son was killed in an Israeli airstrike, was identified by Israel yesterday as the new Hamas leader in the Gaza Strip. Israeli officials signaled he won't be targeted for death if the militant group halts suicide attacks.

Hamas, however, refused to reveal the name of its leader for fear he will be assassinated like his two predecessors.

Late yesterday, two Palestinians were killed in an incident near the Mughazi refugee camp in central Gaza. Palestinian security officials said there was an explosion followed by machine gun fire. First reports said the two were killed when a rocket they were setting up exploded prematurely. The Israeli military said it had no forces in the area.

Also yesterday, Israeli troops killed a 14-year-old Palestinian boy and seriously wounded a 15-year-old girl near Israeli settlements in Gaza. The girl, described as mentally retarded, had wandered into a restricted area.

China

Government blocks elections

HONG KONG (AP) — China killed Hong Kong's hopes for quickly attaining full democracy, ruling yesterday that the territory cannot directly elect its next leader because it could stir social and economic instability.

Critics, including the U.S. consul general, charged that Hong Kong's promised autonomy had been harmed by the decision from China's top legislative panel, the Standing Committee of the National People's Congress. Britain said the ruling went against the deal China signed when former colony Hong Kong was returned to its motherland in 1997.

Pro-democracy Hong Kong lawmakers unfurled a banner and chanted slogans before walking out of a meeting where a Chinese legislative official was explaining the ruling. A small group of student activists outside burned a copy of Hong Kong's mini-constitution, the Basic Law.

Some analysts predicted public anger could explode into more street protests as locals vent frustration at their inability to pick a successor to the highly unpopular Chief Executive Tung Chee-hwa.

Trustee candidates advocate for higher education as state priority

Timothy Daly

Timothy Daly wants to make higher education a top priority in the state. He believes that Massachusetts' public colleges and universities should be affordable and accessible by keeping tuition and fees down and that UMass Amherst needs to be funded like a flagship.

Strongly emphasizing that UMass can not allow bag searches and that UMass will not be a dry campus, Daly believes the University needs a representative that will stand up for students' rights.

Scott Eldridge II/Collegian

Matthew Murphey

Matthew Murphy says advocating for state funding for higher education is a high priority, and says the state ranks 48th in per capita funding for higher education. He plans to attack this problem on a statewide level by initiating grass-roots campaigns to pressure the state to give adequate funding to higher education. He also will also strive to unionize student leadership in state colleges and universities.

Murphy believes that students can say way too much for textbooks. By renegotiating Follett's contract next year, he says he can support the Books-for-Books program and make texts affordable again. For those students who can't afford to buy books, he will implement a textbook rental system where students pay a flat $100 fee for an entire semester's worth of textbooks. He also proposes to organize campaigns to lobby the textbook manufacturers to lower their prices.

Kerry answers critics by questioning Bush's military service

By Nedra Pickler
Associated Press

WHEELING, W.Va. (AP) — John Kerry, a decorated Navy veteran criticized by Republicans for his anti-war activities during the Vietnam era, lashed out at President Bush on yesterday for failing to prove whether he fulfilled his commitment to the National Guard during the same period.

Conservative critics have questioned whether Kerry deserved all three of his Purple Hearts for battle wounds, an issue the Democratic presidential candidate sought to put to rest last week by releasing his military records. On Sunday, a top Bush adviser criticized Kerry for leading anti-war protests after he returned from the battlefield.

"This comes from a president who can't even show or prove that he showed up for duty in the National Guard," Kerry said yesterday during an interview on ABC's "Good Morning America." "And I'm not going to stand for it."

Kerry's direct criticism of Bush's Guard record reflected an aggressive strategy to challenge the president. It came as Vice President Dick Cheney used a speech in Missouri to question Kerry's fitness to be commander in chief, and the Bush campaign launched a $10 million television ad campaign criticizing Kerry's Senate votes on weapons systems.

During the primaries, Kerry often deflected questions about Bush's military service although when asked in February whether Bush had fulfilled his Vietnam-era commitment, the Democrat said, "Just because you get an honorable discharge does not in fact answer that question."

In 1992, as Democratic candidate Bill Clinton faced criticism for avoiding service in Vietnam, Kerry said, "We do not need to divide America over who served and how. I have personally always believed that many served in many different ways."

Democrats have questioned whether Bush fulfilled his obligations to the National Guard in spite of White House claims that he completed his duty satisfactorily. Bush joined the Texas Air National Guard in 1968 and transferred to the Alabama Guard in 1972 while working on a political campaign. How often Bush reported for duty in Alabama is unclear.

Bush supporters have tried to turn Kerry's service in Vietnam — a centerpiece of his Democratic campaign — against him even as they say they honor his service to his country. Kerry released his medical records when questioned about the extent of his war wounds, including a report showing he still carries shrapnel in one leg.

That criticism silenced for the moment, Bush adviser Karen Hughes turned to what Kerry did after returning from the war.

Hughes said Sunday she was offended by Kerry's anti-war activities in 1971 and accused him of not actually throwing back his medals when he and other veterans protested in Washington.

"He only pretended to throw his," Hughes said in a CNN interview. "Now, I can understand if, out of conscience, you take a principled stand, and you would decide that you were so opposed to this that you would actually throw your medals. But to pretend to do so — I think that's very revealing."

Kerry has never said he pretended to throw away his medals. For years, he has said that he threw his ribbons over a fence at the Capitol, not his three Purple Hearts, Bronze Star and Silver Star. He also has said that after the protest he threw the medals of two other veterans.

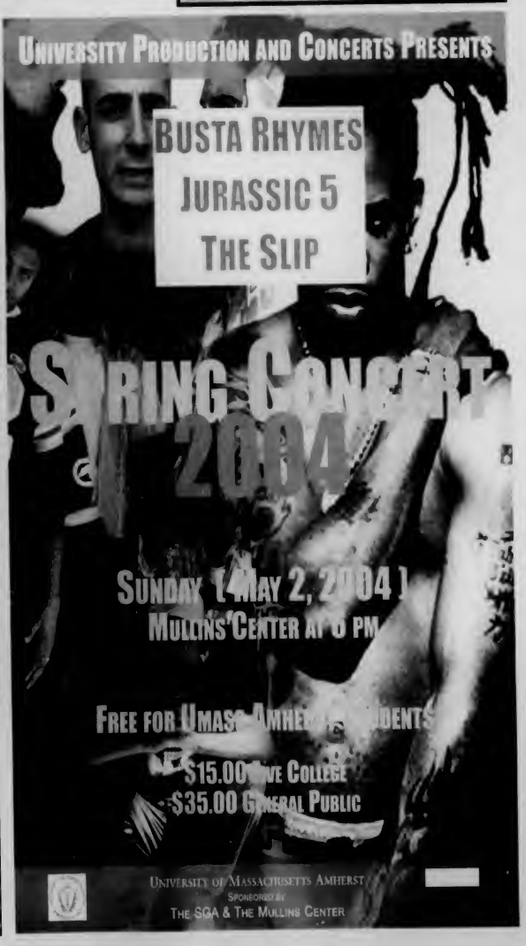
Nearly 800 veterans "gave back" their medals, ribbons, dog tags and other military items during a protest in April 1971. However, a tape of a television interview Kerry gave shortly after the protest suggested he had claimed that he also threw his medals.

In the exchange, aired yesterday by ABC and published in The New York Times, an interviewer asks Kerry, "How many did you give back, John?" Kerry responds, "I gave back, I can't remember, six, seven, eight, nine." The host then notes that Kerry had won the Purple Hearts, and Bronze and Silver stars. Kerry says, "Well, and above that. I gave back my others."

Kerry told ABC yesterday that the terms ribbons and medals were interchangeable. He accused Republicans of trying to discredit his presidential campaign with a "phony controversy."

"The U.S. Navy pamphlet calls them medals," he said. "We referred to them as the symbols, they were representing medals, ribbons. Countless veterans threw the ribbons back."

Kerry was asked to reconcile two explanations for why he didn't throw his own medals — Kerry told The Washington Post in 1985 it was because he didn't want to personally, and he told the Boston Globe in 1996 that he didn't have time to go home and get them.



"I've expressed that there was great, sort of, sense of wrenching about the whole thing," Kerry said. He noted that the anti-war veterans were conflicted over whether to throw them, and although they voted to do so, "I threw my ribbons. I didn't have my medals. It's very simple."

The controversy over the medals overshadowed the start of Kerry's three-day bus tour of four manufacturing states that are expected to be pivotal in this year's election — West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Michigan. Kerry began the tour in Wheeling, W.Va., with a speech accusing Bush of failing to enforce trade rules that protect U.S. workers.

Another obstacle for same-sex marriage

In just under three weeks, on May 17, gay marriage will officially become legal in Massachusetts — for Massachusetts residents only that is. This weekend, Gov. Mitt Romney announced his latest attempt to flout the legalization of gay marriage. He found yet another loophole in a law dating back to 1913 that will prevent any out-of-state same-sex couple from obtaining a marriage license.

The law, originally established because interracial marriages were becoming an issue of increasing concern, says that no couple can be married in Massachusetts if that marriage would be considered "void" in their home state. Romney did say, however, that anyone who comes from a place in which gay marriage is already legal will be permitted to acquire a valid license. Since none of the other 49 states fall into this category, this stipulation will mainly serve people from Ontario, Canada.

It is no secret that many state officials, along with Romney himself, have been against the legalization of gay marriage from the very beginning. They have done everything possible to prevent the inevitable. In fact, a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage and create civil unions instead has received an initial approval by the State Legislature. Fortunately, the issue will not even be discussed until 2006.

In the meantime, however, several justices of the state have said that they would rather resign than uphold the new law. Daniel B. Winslow, the chief legal counsel to Romney, addressed this issue on Sunday.

"If a justice of the peace cannot comply with his or her oath of office, then we would expect that person to tender their resignation from that office."

From these comments, it seems that the Romney administration intends to take the new policy very seriously. However, no mention was made of what the penalties might be for any official who refused to comply.

For someone like Romney, who was so opposed to this issue, it seems strange that his administration should suddenly show such strong support. But we cannot be fooled by appearances. It is not only possible, but quite likely, that Winslow's comments may reflect another motive of the administration.

If all the justices who do not agree with the policy are encouraged to resign by May 17, then there will be a drastic shortage of officials available to perform the numerous marriages that will inevitably be requested. If there is no one to officiate these ceremonies, then clearly less of them will be taking place. It is just another way for Romney to do everything in his power to prevent the inevitable, yet it is another roadblock on the path to equality. Only this time, he has managed to cleverly disguise his sabotage as full-fledged cooperation.

Fighting spring fever

Stacy Kasdin

It's just about May, which means that I'm coming into the homestretch of my junior year here at the University of Massachusetts. This essentially means I spend most of my time running around like some kind of barnyard animal missing an appendage. Right about now is when every professor decides to assign a huge paper, and the ones who don't assign papers give exams.

All right, not every professor. You nice professors out there who don't do that, your students love you. Don't ever change. Let me know what class you teach so I can register for it next semester. This week I have an exam, three papers due, and three books to read! Who has time to read three whole books in one week?

At any rate, at this time of year when the workload gets tough and the weather is gorgeous, I know I start to wonder why I should bother going to my classes. I mean, who needs to learn when it's warm and sunny out? I've learned for seven months already. I need Frisbee.

This mentality is bad. Your alternate plan will always seem like a good idea at the time when compared to classes, but in the long run it will screw you over. This is a guaranteed fact of life — I know because I learned the hard way. Thus, I've come up with a couple of suggestions to beat off that nagging little voice that says, "Oh come on, it's just one class; what's gonna happen?"

Watch a reality TV show. Watching people eat cow vomit with a side of spicy hot slugs to win money will remind you that if you don't go to your classes and end up flunking out, eating cow vomit may be your only potential source of income. I mean, it's cow vomit or working at McDonald's. Hard to pick the lesser of two evils, huh?

Go visit your grandmother. She will tell you about how privileged you are to be going to college. You know, when she was your age she had to walk 15 miles in the snow to work in the factory for .12 cents an hour. Barefoot! Through woods inhabited by packs of hungry wolves! These kids today don't know how spoiled they are with their fancy paved streets and their central heat and air? Geez!

Who needs to learn when it's warm and sunny out? I've learned for seven months already. I need Frisbee.

I realize, however, that no matter how much encouragement to go to class is offered, some people are just not going to go because they're just those kind of people. If you're one of those people, here are a couple of things you can do instead of going to class that you can still manage to learn something from.

Go out to lunch. No, not take out, go sit down and have lunch. First you'll work on your decision-making skills. With all those choices on the menu, it will be a tough one, but I have faith in you. When you get the bill you'll have to figure out a tip for your waitperson. Brushing up on those math skills and chowing down on some non-DC goodness is always a good idea. Mmm ... education.

Go to a museum. The Springfield Science Museum has an exhibit on dinosaurs. They move around and everything. Watching dinosaur robot things move around is inherently more exciting than watching professors move around. You'll learn about history, how to following driving directions and how to budget your gift shop spending money and still have some left to get gas on the way home.

But then there are those people who don't skip class because it's nice out. They don't want to go out and have a good time; they just want to sit around their rooms all day. Indeed, we all know those people. Well, bring your buddy a copy of The Collegian, because he, too, can do some learning, right in his own room.

That box under your bed with the 2 week-old pizza in it? Break that out. It's guaranteed to be growing some mold. You'll be able to learn all kinds of things about bacteria and spores, maybe some entomology. If you take a bite, you can even learn about ambulances, stomach pumping, and antibiotics!

Education is not found only in the classroom. It is all around us, sometimes where we least expect it. Although I understand that some of those alternative education techniques sound awfully tempting, go to your classes. You're going to have papers and exams whether you go or not, so you might as well know what you're supposed to write about or what you're going to be tested on. Who knows, maybe what you learn in your classes will actually prove to be of some use to you in the future. How crazy would that be?

Unpatriotic patriotism

Yousef Munayyer

We are surrounded by "patriotism." You can find American flags anywhere from coffee mugs to the printed land-of-the-free-home-of-the-bikers-T-shirt that fat guy is always wearing at the local pub. So is that what patriotism is? Hardly so, but many believe it to be that way.

So what is patriotism? What does it mean to be patriotic? What does the word even mean? Well if you think about it, it has to have some meaning other than what we use it for today. The word comes from indo-European origins. It denotes a relationship to a land of your "pater" or in English, father. Patriotism is a love of your fatherland, the land in which your ancestors are rooted.

So how did such a deep word become so shallow? How did a word that meant love of tradition and values come to mean the love of displaying colors? The answer is complex and has much to do with one simple fact: America is not the fatherland of Americans.

America is a land of immigrants. Surely Native Americans may object because they were here first, but at one point they came here too. The point is that there is no deep sense of patriotism in America, at least not true patriotism. Sure we fly one flag above all other flags but what does that mean? Do you believe in colored cloth or what it stands for?

The question becomes, can the United States of America, the asexually-produced bastard child of the British Empire, be patriotic in the true sense of the word?

The answer is yes. This is possible because Americans are not a people of a particular race, religion, ethnicity or any other one of those imagined boundaries. Rather, true Americans are people who believe in certain ideals. These ideals have fathers, those individuals that we call the forefathers. The likes of Jefferson, Madison, Washington and so on are individuals we are taught to revere but never to understand.

If Americans hold these values in the highest regard, and those early revolutionaries are the forefathers of those values, patriotism in the United States can only truly exist as a love of those values. Loving and defending the right to speak freely and elect your government are examples of being a true American patriot.

Can the United States of America, the asexually produced bastard child of the British Empire, be patriotic in the true sense of the word?

So now having redefined patriotism, we must be wary of anything else that goes by the same name. Perhaps the most perfect example is the USA Patriot Act. Under a true definition of patriotism, this act, if you read it unlike most members of congress who admitted they hadn't before passing it, would more appropriately be called an Act of Treason. The authors behind the federalist papers who told us that, "ambition must counteract ambition" are rolling in their graves over the reduced checks and balances that the Act of Treason allows. Jefferson, who fought to include the Bill of Rights in the Constitution to guarantee an individuals safety from state action, would be appalled if he could see how this Act of Treason stomps on amendment after amendment.

A true patriot would oppose this Act of Treason because it goes against everything upon which this nation was founded. A true patriot would be enraged at how their forefathers have been insulted. A true patriot would take action, not sit quietly like an apathetic loyalist to the crown. The time to object is now because the longer we stay quiet the greater the powers of the government over the people will be. Perhaps if we oppose this Act of Treason, we can collect the shreds of the Bill of Rights out of the trash receptacle and piece them back together to form a better tomorrow.

One of our greatest, if not wisest, forefathers saw this coming upon the drafting of the Constitution. Benjamin Franklin's words speak with relevance to today's increasingly apathetic public. "I agree to this constitution with all its faults," he said, "and I believe farther that this is likely to be well-administered for a course of years and can only end in despotism as other forms have done before it, when the people shall become so corrupted as to need despotic government, being incapable of any other."

Franklin lived in an era when the people he spoke of demanded certain rights and believed them to be inalienable. Today, with growing apathy and despotism, that demand is diminishing and the corruption Franklin warned of is coming true. That corruption is accepting patriotism to be a display of colored banners instead of accepting patriotism to be fighting for what those colors stand for.

Have we become a corrupted society? If we haven't yet we are surely on our way. It is your choice to decide whether or not to reverse that. It is your choice to decide whether or not you want to be a true patriot.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

BUSTAMANTE DISCUSSES THE VALUE OF TRUTH

I would like to take this opportunity to address the issue of truth. It is a tricky concept, which distinguishes between the truth (lower case), a version of what one believes to be in accordance with reality; and the Truth (capitalized), "a transcendent fundamental or spiritual reality" (Webster's), which is recognized instinctively by all. "I am telling the truth," versus, "I speak The Truth" – that which is understood versus that which is known.

One might expect, as I believe most of us do, that all people understand instinctively that telling the truth is of the utmost importance. However, I have witnessed recently serious violations of Truth in response to perceived threats to self-interest. These truths (viewpoints) that violate Truth require long and complicated explanations, like spending $800 of student money on a newspaper advertisement, or throwing out democratic elections.

The basic fundament of telling the truth is sincerity; one views a situation and describes sincerely what one sees. Different people can see the same situation and each one interpret it differently. This conflict however, does not mean that one of the parties is lying. The lesson here is that there can be more than one truth.

Based on this concept, the founding fathers implemented the First Amendment — Freedom of Speech. The logic is that in a free market place of ideas, where all the truths are aired, the greatest truth will rise to the top. This is how we ensure optimal growth as a country, a state, a city or, in our case, a university.

This is also how we choose our leadership. Each prospective leader speaks his or her truth freely. There is heavy debate, and the leader with the greatest truths gets the most votes, and rises to the top. First, this ensures that our leaders are the most qualified. And second, hearing the other truths and debating strengthens our leaders by giving them greater understanding of a given situation.

What happens when someone injects a lie into this system? It is destructive for two reasons: First, it allows for a candidate whose truths are not the greatest to win by slandering the other candidate. Second, it stops the forging of great leaders, by avoiding the debate of the issues that matter.

Therefore, anyone that has published things knowingly misrepresenting their interests, claiming that I said things they know I did not, or just making things up about me they know are not true, please understand that the harm you are doing is not just to me, or to the SGA campaign of Matt Murphy and myself. Your lies are holding back the entire student body.

If you really want to talk about the issues: how we plan to wake up the student body, implement a textbook rental system or change the credit system to four per class, your feedback can do nothing but help. It will ensure that the students are aware of the issues and choose the correct leaders. When we are wrong or make mistakes, your calling us out can only sharpen us.

The Truth is that truth is invaluable, (especially at this moment and at this school) and your selfishness is an obstacle to progress. I know you are aware of it. You felt The Truth in your gut when you saw the title of this article; that part never even required my defense. Now, shift your vision upwards. Come to the table sincerely; be guided by The Truth and let's take back UMass.

Eduardo Bustamante
SGA Presidential Candidate

ANGRY SENATOR PUSHES FOR CHANGE

There have always been three main political groups on campus: the conservatives and their affiliates, the Progressives and their allies and lastly, the apathetic sheep who couldn't care less. And as it turns out, the sheep were actually the smart ones.

The fact is that you do not matter. You come to this school, one of 18,000-plus. You are here for a degree, followed by a job, followed by a run-of-the-mill life, maybe filled with an exciting vacation or community service. Forget telling the grown-ups how to run things.

Want a meaningful protest, like the kind at the University of Illinois? Well, you can't have one. We have an idiotic, draconian "Picketing Code" that would get those Illinois yahoos expelled if they tried such egregious acts of democracy at this school.

Want to vote? Sorry, your candidate has not been approved by the Student Government Association. Please insert $4,000 to try again.

Want to protest the ... well, we know where that gets you. How about speaking out against Jared Nokes, or his president hopeful roommate. Well, then you get framed as an ALANA supporter. After all, everyone knows only ALANA students are pissed off about this.

The fact is that I am not an ALANA student, and I'm pissed off too. The fact that the 200-plus people now signed up for the campaign are composed of both ALANA (read: minority) and non-ALANA (read: white) students seems to be irrelevant. Facts seem to be irrelevant.

So where does that leave us? With a power-hungry president who uses his ill-gotten veto power to stamp out the ALANA caucus charter the Senate just approved. With a nice Letter to the Editor calling for a polite campaign, followed by a column so desperate to slander Bustamante that the author decided to make stuff up, it leaves us with a Senate that votes down anything progressive. All of this nonsense is done by a small group of senators who are clearly not serving the students. They do seem to do a damn good job of getting in their way, however.

I am calling these senators out. They are not serving the students, not at all. Not when they vote against even considering motions. They place a higher value on rules and bureaucracy than they do on the students they blatantly misrepresent.

What can we do? How should we act when we are not allowed to protest and our vote is ignored? The first thing we do is we vote again. We get every friend we have to join the Eddie Bustamante and Matt Murphy campaign, and we do everything we can to get the only two progressives running into office.

Then, next fall, every progressive who cares about this university runs. Together we can defeat the neo-conservative loonies who have taken over our senate and usurped our voice. Then we ignore the toy budget we are given to play with, and we use the Student Government Association as it should be used: as an organizing tool. We get rid of the picketing code. We change the rules of the game so we no longer require the approval of the administration to pass enactments. We organize powerful protests, sit-ins and demonstrations against budget cuts. We reach out to alumni who can remember when students had power on this campus and organize with their help. We take this campus back, and we keep it.

All they want to do is dance

The UMass Dance team make their way to the small screen

By Glen Straub
Collegian Staff

They don't have any money, a coach or even a choreographer, but that hasn't stopped the University of Massachusetts dance team from finding a way to land on one of the most watched cable sports stations in the country.

Starting tomorrow at 3 p.m. Fox Sports Net will air coverage of the April 2 National Dance Alliance Collegiate Championship from Daytona Beach, Fla., a showcase of the best collegiate dance teams in the country. That group now includes the 11 ladies that make up the UMass team.

The squad, led by co-captains Ashley Whitson and Cecille Dones, finished with a score of 9.04 of 10, placing them ninth out of 300 teams that competed.

"This is really great for the University and the dance team," Whitson, a sophomore School of Management and dance double major said. "A lot of people don't understand dance teams or dance competition so it will be cool to watch it on television."

"We now have to keep working harder because we realized we have more room to grow and you can never do too much."
-Ashley Whitson

According to Whitson, normally the NDA is where nationally ranked teams with professional coaches face-off to see who is the best in the country but, after sending a video to the committee, UMass was invited to compete. The Registered Student Organization then received financial help from the Student Government Association, the Alumni Alliance and the Arts Council and made their way down to the Sunshine State to prove that you don't need all the valuable resources to be considered one the best squads in the nation.

"I was really amazed how much better the competition got this year and how well we did against it," Whitson said. "We now have to keep working harder because we realized we have more room to grow and you can never do too much."

This isn't the first time the UMass dance team has been in the national spotlight though. In 1999, it appeared on the cover of Dance Spirit Magazine and in 2002 the squad finished third in the very same competition — the best ever showing for them.

Other than competing with some of the best squads in the nation once a year, the dance team performs at numerous school events around campus including football and basketball games, the New Students Open House as well as other local events.

Whitson plans to return to the Championships next year and she hopes to add more people to the team. Auditions for the 2004-05 UMass Dance Team are May 8 at 10 a.m. in the Curry Hicks Cage.

Calvin to welcome jazz great Marsalis

By Deborah Geiger
Collegian Staff

If you still equate jazz to elevator music by the time you're in college, your musical tastes are going to need some big time maturation.

What is jazz anyway? Is it that crap coming out of dad's old record player? Or is it something fresher, something greater, something with logic and power and thinking behind each and every note? You decide.

Wynton Marsalis
Tonight
Calvin
Northampton

Jazz great Wynton Marsalis, arguably one of the most accomplished and acclaimed jazz artists and composers of his generation is coming to the Calvin Theater tonight at 8 p.m. with tickets ranging from $25 to $45. A chance to see a jazz great live, the performance may just change the way you listen to music.

Straight out of the New Orleans outskirts, Wynton Marsalis has helped propel jazz to the forefront of American culture through his brilliant performances, recordings, compositions, educational efforts and his Artistic Direction at Lincoln Center.

Marsalis began playing the trumpet at age 12 and played in local bands in orchestras. He made his recording debut in 1982 and over the last two decades he has produced close to 40 outstanding jazz and classical recordings for Columbia Jazz and Sony Classical winning him nine Grammy Awards. In 1983 he became the first and only artist to win both classical and jazz Grammy Awards in one year and, remarkably, repeated this feat in 1984

Marsalis was named one of America's "25 Most Influential People" by Time magazine, one of "The 50 Most Influential Boomers" by Life magazine, won the 1997 Pulitzer Prize for music for his jazz oratorio Blood on the Fields (the first jazz musician to receive the award), received the United Nations designation of "Messenger of Peace" by UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan in 2001, as well as the Congressional "Horizon Award" In 2002.

Perhaps one of the most compelling things about Wynton's appearance here in the Valley is his direct connection to the University of Mass-achusetts. Journalism instructor Carl Vigeland co-authored "Jazz in the Bittersweet Blues of Life" with Marsalis in 2001. "Jazz" is a book about life, jazz and touring the big cities and small towns across America.

His latest work, "The Magic Hour (Blue Note)," includes eight tracks: "Feeling of Jazz" (featuring Dianne Reeves on vocals), "You and Me," "Free to Be, Baby I Love You" (featuring Bobby McFerrin on vocals), "Big Fat Hen," "Skipping," "Sophie Rose-Rosalee," and "The Magic Hour." When asked what the "magic hour" was, Marsalis simply said, "For kids, the one hour before they go to bed. For parents, the one hour after the kids go to sleep."

Snow Patrol revives Britpop

By Johnny Donaldson
Collegian Staff

Let's be honest with ourselves here folks: most Britpop generally falls on the shorter end of the quality spectrum.

Oasis did right by "Wonderwall," but the brothers Gallagher have gotten progressively worse with each succesive song. Coldplay are leaders of the pack, but they got off to a feeble (and overrated) start with "Yellow" before finding their groove on "A Rush of Blood to the Head." And the musical landscape is littered with the bloated and rotting corpses of fairly mediocre third-tier acts like The Coral. Starsailor and Palo-alto (which is, honestly, an American Britpop band) who think they can ride Coldplay's gently wafting breeze to commercial victory.

Truthfully, I've had my fill of wimpy jellyfish bands that are comprised of spineless, unruffled guitars, anemic drums and a singer with a tweet falsetto chirping out some brittle, toothless melody.

And now here comes Snow Patrol, a quartet of Britpoppers-by-way-of-Ireland who have started to make me think that there may be, just may be, some juice left in this genre after all.

"Final Straw" is the band's third album, and their first on a major label; their previous efforts, "Songs for Polar Bears" and "When It's All Over We Still Have To Clear Up" were released by the tiny leepster Records without making a musical dent, even in the hermetic world of indie music. Such an anonymous, unfamiliar band isn't the most likely choice for big money commemoration, but Snow Patrol strive very hard to be worthy of playing in the big leagues. "Final Straw" is a gorgeous breakthrough, one of the loveliest records so far this year.

"Final Straw" gently kicks off with the hauntingly poetic "How To Be Dead" and ends with the spare and austere "Same." Everything in between has the same glowing, honeyed shimmer. At times that means "Final Straw" can get to be very samey-sounding; a few songs fall into lush lifelessness, all glittery surface but little musical substance. But only a few.

Snow Patrol
'Final Straw'
A&M

Snow Patrol display a knack for seductive melody, warm harmonies and just enough grit to keep the album from becoming too pretty for it's one good. "Wow" and "Gleaming Auction" props up the Britpop with crunchy guitar muscle and sleek embellishments; stirring strings and electronic effects crop up throughout "Final Straw" and helps to deepen and layer the albums texture.

The album's centerpiece tracks, its best songs, are the robust "Chocolate" and the anthemic "Run," which invite comparison to homeland heroes U2. They almost make up for the album's flaws — the droning "Ways and Means" and dull "Grazed Knees" most notably.

What seprates Snow Patrol away from your usual Britpop boys (there's a reason why it's been derisively called "sad-bastard" music) is that singer Gary Lightbody doesn't just moan in a "woe-is-the-world" falsetto pierce. Lightbody has a more resonant, velvetine voice and precise phrasing; he sounds like he's singing with emotion, not self-pity.

And emotion is a large part of Snow Patrol's music. "Final Straw" is another album about rock's eternal theme, but it's a relatively mature and nuanced appraisal of it. There are a lot of lyrics about love-gone-wrong on "Final Straw," but they take on multiple aspects of romance, life and love and not just the ol' she-done-me wrong routine.

"Final Straw" is an imperfect album, but a beautiful one too. It does just enough to break Snow Patrol out of the indie-rock doldrums — and keeps them from being another pathetic Coldplay clone.

Snow Patrol may be Britpop's saving grace. The band's latest release, "Final Straw," is an impressive effort by the group and helps them stand out from other acts of their kind.

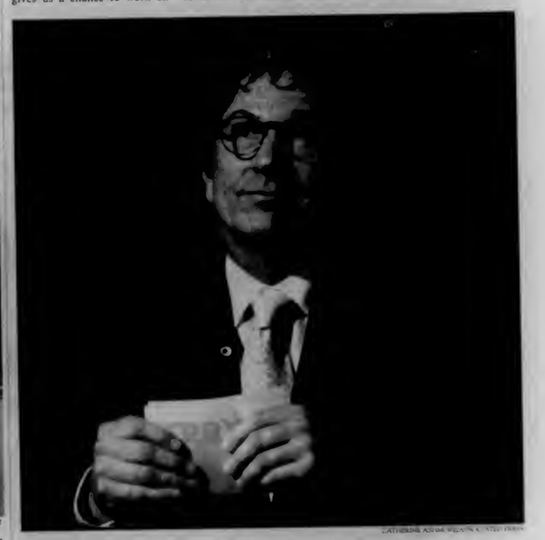
Springer musical set to hit Broadway stages in 2005

By Michael Kuchwara
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — "Jerry Springer — The Opera" is coming to Broadway but not until the fall of 2005.

The raucous, raunchy London hit about the American talk show host will open Oct. 20, 2005, at a theater to be announced, producer Jon Thoday said yesterday in a telephone interview from London.

But first, the $13.9 million production will play San Francisco's Orpheum Theatre for six weeks starting at the end of February or the beginning of March 2005, the producer said.



"Going to San Francisco, gives us a chance to work on the show if we need to improve it," Thoday said. No cast has been set for the American production, and Thoday has not ruled out hiring Michael Brandon, an American who originated the role in London.

"'Jerry Springer' is a musical that appeals to people who like musicals and people who don't," Thoday said. "It's got crossover appeal. It has brought a whole new audience into the theater. And it's very funny. Aside from 'The Producers,' there are not that many genuinely funny musicals."

"Jerry Springer," created by Richard Thomas and Stewart Lee, opened last April to rave reviews at the National Theatre in London and later transferred for a commercial run to the Cambridge Theater where it is still playing.

The production, which won the Olivier Award (the British equivalent of the Tony Award) for best musical, features tap-dancing Ku Klux Klansmen, rude language and a never-ending parade of lowlifes and freaks. In the musical, Springer is shot at the end of the first act and gets dragged down to hell.

The real-life Springer saw the show last November in London and praised the production while distancing himself from the Jerry portrayed in it. "It's a persona, and they did it remarkably well," he said. "As an opera, it's perfect."

Gordon uses caution to defeat Earnhart; fans boo decision

By John Zenor
Associated Press

TALLADEGA, Ala. (AP) - Jeff Gordon soaked up the moment after his first win of the season. Dale Earnhardt Jr. found a very different reason to enjoy what happened.

When NASCAR declared Gordon the winner in Sunday's Aaron's 499 — finished under caution rather than with any last-lap drama — it proved the fan favorite doesn't get all the calls, after all.

"I'm real glad that one of these calls finally went against me," Earnhardt said. "It's going to shut up a lot of people."

And his fans voiced their opinion by tossing beer, soda cans and whatever else was handy onto the Talladega track.

The normally straight-laced Gordon had his fun with the scene, easing around the track and spinning his wheels in a victory celebration.

"I know it's going to be controversial, but I don't care," he declared in the winner's circle.

He seized the lead from Earnhardt with six laps remaining, setting the stage for a scintillating finish. It didn't happen.

Earnhardt was making a strong bid for the lead coming off turn four of lap 184 in the 188-lap race when rookie Brian Vickers and Casey Mears collided. That brought out the 11th caution flag of the race.

Just like that, Dale Earnhardt Inc.'s string of five straight Cup wins — four by Earnhardt and one last fall by Michael Waltrip — at Talladega was over.

Earnhardt questioned NASCAR's ruling that Gordon held the lead when the caution started, but last fall's rule change means the field is frozen when the yellow comes out rather than letting the competitors race to the flagstand.

"I just feel like I was ahead of him, that's my only argument," Earnhardt said. "Other than that, I thought it was a great race."

It was Gordon's third win on Talladega's 2.66-mile oval and the 65th of his NASCAR career, and just as satisfying even with the anticlimactic finale.

"It seems like a long time since I've won any race," said Gordon, whose last win came at Atlanta in October 2003, a 12-race drought. "I can't think of a better one to win."

The first ruling had Earnhardt's No. 8 Chevrolet ahead. Gordon said he knew he had a slight lead.

"When I got to turn 2 they said the No. 24 was ahead of the No. 8," Gordon said. "And I said, 'Really? OK.'

"He rode next to me because obviously he wanted to fight the call. Neither one of us really knew."

Earnhardt had another brush with controversy at Talladega in the 2003 spring race, getting the benefit of the decision that time. His No. 8 Chevrolet was clearly below the yellow out-of-bounds line when he passed Matt Kenseth for the lead with five laps to go, but NASCAR let the win stand despite the rules violation.

"I've been on both ends of this, getting the call to go for you, getting the call to go against you," said Earnhardt, who expanded his series lead to 94 over Jimmie Johnson. "I was racing below the yellow line last year, and they called it fair.

"This one didn't go my way. It's not a big deal."

NASCAR spokesman Jim Hunter said a videotape review clearly showed Gordon ahead when the caution lights came on.

Yankees looking for answers

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) — Standing next to Yankees general manager Brian Cashman in an elevator, Reggie Jackson was startled by the silence.

"We're not going to a funeral, are we?" the Hall of Famer said.

No, but it sure seemed that way.

The Yankees had just been swept by the Red Sox, their $183 million assortment of prized players booed by fans.

Even popular captain Derek Jeter wasn't immune. Batting just .175 and hitless in a career-high 25 at-bats, he became a target Sunday, when Boston improved to 6-1 against the Yankees for the first time since 1913.

"The booing is directed at a lot of people, and it should be," Jeter said. "We haven't played well. It shows that people care."

Stars with startling salaries have gone to the plate with dead wood. Bernie Williams (.167) and Jason Giambi (.204) are in major slumps, and AL MVP Alex Rodriguez (.257) is just starting to battle out of his rut.

Mike Mussina (1-4) and Jose Contreras (0-2) have struggled on the mound, and there's no pitching depth to step in.

For now, George Steinbrenner maintains a public calm — unusual for the Yankees owner at times like this. While he issued an eloquent statement quoting a Broadway show tune after New York lost its season opener, Steinbrenner was more subdued Monday.

"I have a great manager in Joe Torre and general manager in Brian Cashman, and have confidence in both of them. It's in their hands," he said in a statement.

At 8-11, New York is three games under .500 this late in the season for the first time since 1997 — the last time the Yankees didn't finish first. Their 4 1/2-game deficit is their largest since May 2002.

And while they don't face the Red Sox again until June 29, Oakland comes to town Tuesday and will start Tim Hudson, Mark Mulder and Barry Zito, three of baseball's best pitchers.

As Yankees Hall of Famer Yogi Berra says, "It gets late early out there."

Jackson knows that, having played for the Yankees and now an adviser to the team who talks to Cashman.

"I don't think anybody's happy — that's from top to bottom," Cashman said. "Actually, I don't think. I know none of us are happy. We're frustrated. We're better than this. We all know it."

New York has a .217 batting average, lower than every other major league team except Montreal. The Yankees are tied with Cleveland with a major league-high 19 errors.

"There's fustration on everybody's face," Gary Sheffield said.

the half. After trading a series of goals over much of the second half, LaSalle's Catie Borneman scored on a free position shot to give the Explorers a two-goal lead with 12:11 left in regulation.

Down 12-11 in the final minute of play, Samantha Sepulveda of UMass scooped up a crucial ground ball, sprinted down the field and scored the tying goal with 12 seconds left on the clock to force overtime.

During the first OT, Drown and Sepulveda gave UMass a 14-12 lead with goals at 2:35 and 1:12, respectively. But with time running out in the first three-minute overtime period, a goal from Nicole Sunderland of LaSalle narrowed the gap to one.

As the second overtime began, Massachusetts hoped to stall for the final three minutes. Having lost two games in overtime earlier in the season, UMass turned up the defensive pressure with hopes of pinning the Explorers against the sideline.

Unfortunately for the Minutewomen, their defensive stranglehold resulted in a penalty at 2:43. Hentwood was awarded a free position shot following the infraction, an opportunity she capitalized on by hitting the back of the cage on the ensuing breakaway. Henwood's goal sent the game into a third, and sudden-death overtime.

After two three-minute periods of scoreless play, Drown tipped a shot past Brittany Friederich of LaSalle at 1:51, in the fifth period.

"I think we were really focused going into the weekend," Drown said. "We knew we needed both wins if we were going to make the A-10's and put together a total team effort."

Maine following an overthrow. Elizabeth Foltz picked up the fifth run before Busa retired the final two batters to end the inning. Kelli Arnold (13-5) replaced Busa following the inning.

In the bottom of the sixth, the Minutewomen hammered out five runs to regain the lead. After pitcher Alexis Pullen loaded the bases, she was pulled in favor of Jen Merchant, only to see Denis slam a three-run double off the left-centerfield fence to make it 6-5.

Aisha Franke gave the Minutewomen two more runs with a single to right to seal an 8-5 victory.

On a rainy Sunday in Philadelphia, UMass helped open up Temple's brand new Ambler Softball Field with a bang, splitting a series with the Owls (19-14, 5-1 A-10) in back-to-back games that went down to the wire.

Game 1 saw Kelley make history again, this time being the first home run ever to be hit at Ambler Field.

After Arnold gave up five runs in the first, the Minutewomen were forced to once again claw their way back to the top. They tied it up with one run in the second and four in the third, highlighted by Kelley's three-run homer that went high over the left-center fence.

Kelley is now just four home runs from tying UMass' career record for home runs (26), set last season by Brandi Cross.

The Owls got an unearned run in the third to regain the lead, but Denis stepped up for yet another game-winning hit to drive in two.

The Minutewomen picked up an insurance run from KJ Kelley following a 52-minute rain delay.

Simply put, game two was a pitcher's duel for the ages between Busa and Kim Watkins. When all was said and done, however, the Owls picked up their first win against Maroon and White since 1997.

With both pitchers tallying strikeout after strikeout, something had to give. The Owls got a break in the third, going up 2-0 following an unearned run, and the Minutewomen would never recover.

Down one run in the seventh, the Maroon and White had a golden opportunity with runners in scoring position. Lesley Ferrera grounded out, however, for the final out of the game and a Temple win.

Jenna Busa gave up five runs, two of them earned, in UMass's 8-5 victory over Maine.

Singh wins Houston Open for second time

By Michael Graczyk
Associated Press

HUMBLE, Texas (AP) — Vijay Singh is usually unbeatable when he leads a tournament after three rounds.

Vijay Singh shot a 4-under 68 in the final round Monday at the rain-delayed Houston Open, holding off Scott Hoch and John Daly for a two-stroke victory.

Singh finished the four rounds at 11-under 277 for his second victory in Houston, where he won two years ago. He had a share of the lead with John Huston entering the final round, but was able to pull away for his sixth straight win when leading a tourney after three rounds.

"The last few times when I did go into the lead, I've been striking the ball well, so when you do that you don't feel threatened that someone else is going to overtake you," Singh said.

"You just let your game do the talking."

Hoch was second at 9-under after a closing 67. Huston (71) was another shot back, followed by Stephen Ames (69) and Dudley Hart (70).

"Today was the best I've played in a long, long time," Singh said. "I struck the ball really solid from tee to green. Looking back, I'd like to play this way all the time."

He hasn't been far off all year. It was the second victory of 2004 for Singh and his 17th on the tour. In 11 events this year, he's finished in the top 10 six times.

Daly and Hoch started the last round three shots back. Daly got to within one stroke of the lead before fading late. He finished with a 71, leaving him six strokes back for the tournament.

Weather problems interrupted play three consecutive days at the Redstone Golf Club and pushed the tournament into Monday, where third-round play was completed for most of the field earlier in the day.

Singh opened the event with a 74, but his second-round 66 equaled the low round of the tournament. He completed his third round earlier Monday, making an 88-foot chip for eagle at the 12th hole that gave him a 69 and a share of the lead with Huston after 54 holes at 7-under.

Singh began the final round after a short break and birdied two of the first three holes, rolling in a 20-foot putt at the par-5 No. 1.

At the 209-yard par-3 third hole, his tee shot stopped less than 2 1/2 feet from the pin. His putt for birdie gave him the lead outright at 9 under.

Tillman: a real hero

petitors and teammates alike. But it only serves as a display of Tillman's character and outlook on life. If it was worth doing, Pat Tillman wanted to do it right. He continued that theme until his death from a bullet in a far-away region of the world.

When he saw the airliners slam into the buildings on 9/11, he had the same emotional reaction that many Americans experienced. Rather than curse the unknown enemy, or display some artificial, jingoistic piatitudes on his vehicle or attire, he went out and did the thing that so many of us consider, yet so few can actually do. He joined the roughest, toughest unit in the military, both to accompany his brother Kevin, and to serve his country. He did the honorable thing we all threaten, but never follow through on.

Does Tillman's death outrank that of any others that have occurred in defense of this country and its ideals? Certainly not. And judging from reports and testimony, if he were alive today, he would almost certainly ask us to kindly stop making such a big deal. He is recognized because he did something well enough to perform on his chosen profession's biggest stage. He is, by nature, a celebrity, although he did everything in his power to shun that image when he put down the football helmet and picked up the army rifle.

There are many, and you can count this writer among them, who disagree with the war in Iraq, the perceived "war on terrorism," and the other creations of the Bush Administration, such as the actions that led to Tillman's death in Afghanistan. But that doesn't diminish what Tillman did. That he was willing to go, quite literally, to the front lines of the battle for democracy and the American way in which he so strongly believed is by far the greatest thing he ever accomplished; more powerful than any tackle, more awe-inspiring than any play on the field. It is true patriotism, and it is worthy of praise, pride, and undying respect.

Tillman's legacy is not the statistics he racked up, the plays he made, the maneuvers he accomplished on the battlefield, or the death he suffered. His legacy is the character of a man who first refused a multi-million dollar raise to leave the team that gave him his dream shot, then denied another multi-million dollar contract to live the Ranger's life, one of hard work, thankless effort, and ultimate sacrifice.

Pat Tillman was an interesting, admirable human being who took the initiative on his personal beliefs, and fought against those who would threaten our way of life. The political arguments and jaded criticisms of his choice are worth no more than the nickels in your pocket, because Pat Tillman embodied exactly what my good friend's coin describes. Tillman led the way, and did so of his own accord. For that, we should both mourn and honor a true hero.

Minutewomen 'Bear' down

UMass takes two of three

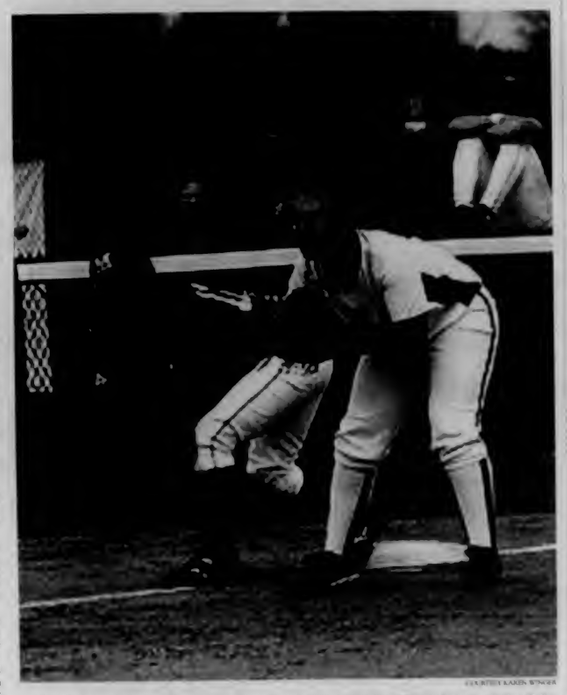
By BRENDIAN HALL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

In all three of their games this weekend, the Massachusetts softball team found itself trailing, a position it hasn't been in since it played in the Blue and Gold Classic in Miami.

"They became very determined," UMass coach Elaine Sortino said. "We had some very adverse situations, but they were very focused and responded well. I thought it was the weather more than anything else that effected our play."

Rain or shine, the Minutewomen emerged victorious on two occasions.

Denise Denis recorded five RBI and two game-winning hits, and KJ Kelley smashed her 13th home run of the season over the three-game stretch, in which the Minutewomen downed the Maine Black Bears and split a doubleheader with Temple.



"That was the longest and furthest home run I've ever seen in my coaching career. I wish I had it on video," Sortino said. "If this ball were hit at our field, I think it would have hit the grass on the other side of the street."

The Minutewomen (24-13, 7-1 Atlantic 10) started off the weekend by surviving a scare at home from the Black Bears (18-15). A bases-clearing double by Denis Denis was good enough to erase a two-run deficit going in the sixth and pick up a win for the Maroon and White.

Although UMass took an early 3-0 lead in the second on runs from Jamie Cahalan, Pam Sulick and Denis, they quickly dug themselves a hole in the fourth inning, when three errors turned into a five-run inning by the Black Bears.

Jenna Busa (11-7) gave up two singles and an RBI double to lead off the inning, and things only got worse from there. After the Black Bears tied it up following a sacrifice bunt by Tibbetts and a mishandled ground ball by Hilary Puglia, Christina Belmonte scored the go-ahead run for Sophomore third basemen Katie Jo Kelley had a hit, a walk and a strikeout against Maine on Friday. Kelley currently hold the UMass record for home runs in a season with 13, she also leads the team with 33 RBIs.

I carry a coin in a small, hidden compartment in my wallet. It's not legal tender — it wouldn't buy me a candy bar, much less anything else. It doesn't work in the laundry machines, and it definitely doesn't give me any extra time on a parking meter. But it's worth more to me than any money I've ever had.

It is a U.S. Army Ranger coin. My friend, a former Ranger, earned it for finishing the elite Ranger school ahead of schedule. From time to time, when I'm bored, in need of inspiration, or simply looking for a reminder of what's good about America, I pull out the coin. On one side it is all bronze, save for the black-backed Ranger emblem. On the other side, the Ranger shield is the only thing in color, its deep green and blue quarters standing out among the bronze. The names of famous battlefields where Rangers were a primary presence also appear: Anzio, Maiora, Burma, Vietnam, and others.

Among the numerous symbols and words that appear on the coin, two phrases anchor it all, and stand out. On the back: "Rangers lead the way," the unit's English motto, and on the front: "Sua sponte," a Latin phrase which translates roughly to, "of their own accord."

Those phrases used to hold only an abstract value for me, until Friday, when they became as true to me as any other words I've ever heard or read.

Pat Tillman is a hero. There should be no discussion of that fact — although, regrettably, there is. He is not a hero because he played football well — although he did. He is not a hero because he served in the Army, and certainly not because he died in combat. He is a hero because he is precisely the kind of American we all want to be, the type of person whose character outweighed his ego, whose loyalty to his country and his cause outpaced any desire for fame and riches.

In life, Pat Tillman was the quintessential football player. Tough, gritty, and in possession of the ability to take incredible amounts of punishment, then get up and play the next down. He dished it out, too, hitting his own teammates in practice at game-speed, much to the dismay of the poor Cardinal receivers that ended up in his crosshairs.

Barry Bonds, Jason Giambi, Bill Romanowski, Marion Jones ... if you are a true sports fan you know who these athletes are. Day-in and day-out, these players and others of the same pedigree are flashed across headlines and television screens, extolling their talents that separate them from the rest of us.

Now the headlines are slowly changing and these gladiators of American athletics are coming under question for how they attained their superior ability. The question marks are stemming from a man named Victor Conte.

If you are not aware of whom Conte is, let me explain.

Victor Conte was brought under question for his involvement with an upscale drug ring, which in short was supplying athletes with performance enhancing drugs.

Under oath he mentioned a list of athletes, including the aforementioned names. Now, after months of toying with and dancing around the subject, the media is about to blow this baby up.

And what a perfect time it is.

Barry Bonds is less than a year from breaking the all-time home run record, the summer Olympics are right around the corner, and after one of the most talent-clad drafts in recent memory, football is creeping into people's minds.

Now that Conte has broken the "truth" about the steroid issue, professional athletes will be forced under the lens of guilty until proven innocent.

This is not to say that these athletes are innocent of the charges against them, but as this issue pans out in the courtroom, it is the newspaper pages that are affecting the way we envision our living legends.

There is the issue of dropping asterisks in the record books if the records were attained with the help of these drugs, there is even the argument that they should be dropped from the books altogether.

I'll tell you what I think about both of these ideas, it starts with bull and ends with ... well you get the idea.

It is one of those topics that needs a definitive starting point before you can attempt to put an end to it. Marking off a particular record because it was allegedly achieved with the help of a needle or pill is a hard idea to sell, as there is no clear-cut way to distinguish when it all started.

In 2001 Barry Bonds woke up the gods of baseball by hitting an unprecedented 73 home runs. At the time the media was still recovering from its hangover left from the Sammy Sosa-Mark McGwire chase, so it was noticed, but not in the same context.

So now, nearly three years after the fact, if Bonds is indeed guilty of steroid usage there is a chance this record will forever live under scrutiny, regardless of what punctuation statisticians want to place next to it.

There are too many questions in regard to the past to make overwhelming generalizations about the present. It is impossible to determine whether McGwire was on steroids when he hit 70, or if someone like Lawrence Taylor was juiced up every time he made a bone-crushing sack on an unwary quarterback.

Records were meant to be broken and as the game evolves so do the athletes that play it. No matter what happens with this issue, records will fall there will be questions on how they were laid to rest.

Maybe McGwire saw this one coming a year after he hit 70; maybe he just knew it was his time to get out while the image of him holding his boy at home plate was fresh in our heads.

Now there are players like Bonds and Sosa that are scapegoats of progression and for years to come will have a lingering doubt on the legitimacy of their feats.

It's just sad that when we are telling stories of the "great ones," to our kids we might have to pause mid-sentence to explain how some drug helped them to the top.

I'd rather leave out the vocal asterisk.

Women's lax finds love in Philly

By MATT BARSTOW
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team needed to sweep La Salle and St. Joseph's over the weekend to keep its postseason hopes alive.

And that's exactly what it did.

UMass	13	The City of Brotherly
Hawks	11	Love proved a hospitable host for the Minutewomen as they swept through Philadelphia, besting the Hawks 13-11 on Friday, and the Explorers 15-14 in double overtime on Sunday.

UMass	15	The victories improve
LaSalle	14	UMass to 5-9

on the season (3-3 A-10), but more importantly bump Massachusetts up from the seventh to fourth seed in the conference. With one game remaining, George Washington is tied with UMass as the fourth and qualifying team for the A-10 championships.

Tracy Drown was the hands-down star for UMass, leading the way with six points on five goals and one assist, in both games. The senior attacker exploded on offense, scoring 10 goals on 15 shots over the weekend.

"Honestly a lot of it was being in the right place a the right time," said Drown in reference to her 12-point showing.

But the weekend didn't prove to be all bells and whistles for UMass, as it watched St. Joseph's jump out to an early 4-0 lead to start Friday's game. The seven-minute run was finally halted when UMass sparked its own four-goal barrage. The fast pace would not continue however, as the teams became locked in a back-and-forth battle that saw the Hawks claim a 9-7 lead at the break.

As the second frame opened, Kristen Teklinsky of St. Joseph's scored her fourth goal to give the Hawks the 10-7 advantage, before Kerry O'Connell's unassisted goal extended the Hawk lead to 11-8 midway through the second half. With their hopes diminishing the Minutewomen went on a tear, scoring five goals in the final 20 minutes of play to insure victory.

The Massachusetts defense proved impenetrable during the second half. Anchored by redshirt freshman goaltender Lauren McCarthy, UMass allowed no goals on three shots.

UMass carried its momentum into Sunday, jumping out to a 3-0 lead. After Hope Zelinger scored her first of four goals at 10:16, the score stood at 5-2 in favor of UMass. Combined with her two-goal performance on Friday, Zelinger finished the weekend only one tally shy of tying the third-leading single season goal scoring record in school history.

LaSalle went on to score a series of goals, but Massachusetts maintained a 7-6 lead going into

Celtics recommend, but don't re-sign Carroll

By JIMMY GOLEN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WALTHAM, Mass. (AP) — John Carroll got a job recommendation — but not a job — from Danny Ainge.

"John Carroll did a fantastic job for our team based on the situation he was given," Ainge said yesterday after announcing that Carroll would not be promoted from interim coach and given a more permanent job.

"In the right circumstances, at the right time and the right place, John Carroll is very qualified to coach in the NBA," Ainge said. "This is a time that we need to make a change."

Carroll was in his seventh season as a Celtics assistant coach when Jim O'Brien resigned on Jan. 27 over philosophical differences with Ainge.

The Celtics went 14-22 under Carroll to finish the regular season 10 games below .500, but they still managed to eke out the last playoff berth in the Eastern Conference. They were swept in the first round by the Indiana Pacers.

Carroll left the team's practice facility before Ainge spoke on Monday and was not available for comment. Players and owners also left the team's breakup meeting without commenting.

But Carroll seemed to know what was coming.

"I have been a coach my whole life. I think when you are a coach you understand that coaching is a very precarious job," he said after the Pacers completed the sweep with a 90-75 victory on Sunday.

"I've been very fortunate to be in one place for seven years here with the Celtics, and I'm very appreciative of the responsibility that I was given."

Ainge said he is in no hurry to make a decision about a new coach.

"I'm not going to have a gun to my head, because there's no immediate need," Ainge said before joking: "I would like to have a head coach in place now, so he could answer these questions and I could go to Europe and scout players."

Speculation on replacements has focused on Paul Westphal, Lionel Hollins, Doc Rivers, Dwane Casey, Jeff Hornacek and Avery Johnson. Ainge, who coached the Phoenix Suns from 1996-99, would not comment on candidates except to say he was not himself a candidate.

Asked whether Carroll would be offered a job in the organization, Ainge said: "Not unless the new coach would like to have John Carroll on his staff."

Carroll was the head coach at Duquesne from 1989-95 and a longtime Celtics assistant who took over when O'Brien resigned over differences with Ainge. Although the Celtics made the Eastern Conference finals and semifinals the previous two seasons, Ainge traded star Antoine Walker and O'Brien favorites such as Eric Williams and Tony Battie.

The moves netted injured big man Raef Lafrentz and Ricky Davis, among others, and made it difficult for O'Brien to implement his disciplined, defensive style. Like Rick Pitino before him, O'Brien gave up on trying to restore the Celtics to their past luster and quit; the Philadelphia 76ers hired him last week to be their head coach.

Radical Student Union to rally against Coke

The University of Massachusetts Radical Student Union is asking students to join them today and tomorrow protesting against the renewal of the University's contract with the Coca-Cola Co.

The contract being protested is the University's exclusive seven-year contract with the Coca-Cola Company that expires on July 22. In the next few weeks the vending contract will be open to corporate bidding.

In a letter to the University's administration on March 25, the Radical Student Union claimed it was asking the University not to renew its contract with the Coca-Cola on the basis of allegations against the company, "for the cause of furthering social and environmental justice on campus and around the world."

Allegations include claims that the company has committed workers' right violations in Colombia, provided inadequate health care for workers in Africa and is responsible for the contamination and abuse of water resources in India.

"I think Coca-Cola is responsible for human rights abuse. I don't want my money going to that, as a student," said Ian Trefethen, senior psychology major and member of the RSU.

According to a report written in February 2004 by the International Labor Rights Fund, a lawsuit was filed against Coca-Cola and its Colombian associates in July 2001. The lawsuit was brought forth on behalf of the Colombian labor union, SINALTRAINAL, which claimed the company is hiring paramilitaries to murder, abduct and torture trade union leaders. SINALTRAINAL claimed Coca-Cola is responsible for the assassination of nine of its employees, however the case was dismissed from the courts in March 2003.

Another reason for protesting Coca-Cola is a claim that the company has pro-

Internships aid in job chances

By JENNIFER MOSKAL
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Thousands of University of Massachusetts students may be looking for jobs, and UMass has one of New England's largest internship and co-op programs to help them, but a majority of UMass students aren't taking advantage of it.

Jeff Silver, assistant director of field experience at Career Services, says he's shocked at the number of students who don't seem to realize the importance of an internship.

"I've had seniors come to me their second semester and say 'I didn't know about you,' or 'I didn't have the time,' " Silver said. "And because of that they're graduating with no experience."

This semester, some 300 UMass students are working on internships or co-ops. About 280 of the internships are local, Silver estimates, and only 20 students have internships outside of western Massachusetts.

"There's nothing wrong with local part-time internships," Silver said. "But if you want a job in Boston or New York City, you need to go there."

Among the 20 or so students who have ventured outside of the Valley this semester is Jessica Filipowski, a junior journalism major now in New York City interning with NBC's "Today" show. Filipowski says that internships help students learn whether they're pursuing the right careers by giving an inside view.

"I have worked closely with producers on segments doing various tasks: compiling research, finding clips for segments, [and] sitting in on editing sessions," Filipowski said. "I have gone on live shoots with Al Roker, have met with Katie Couric to screen a segment I was able contribute to with her main producer, and have watched Matt Lauer interview Jerry Seinfeld. I've logged a million tapes, have made dubs and run errands. And of course, the mail room is inevitable as well as unavoidable."

Universities lobby for simplified VISA process

Schools fear dropping numbers in foreign student college applications

BOSTON (AP) — A steep decline in graduate school applications from foreign students has university administrators pushing the federal government to reform the visa process. Their argument: The trend could cost U.S. schools much-needed revenue and research help, and make America seem isolated in the eyes of the world.

International graduate student applications for this fall are down 32 percent compared with a year ago, according to a recent survey, and schools are extending application deadlines so they don't lose students still negotiating U.S. bureaucracy.

Meanwhile, in public comments and private lobbying, universities are urging federal officials to speed up visa applications, stressing that America's role as a beacon to the world's students could be in jeopardy.

Officials from several California schools and the Department of Homeland Security discussed foreign student matters Tuesday at a gathering in San Diego.

And representatives from a handful of prominent schools, including the presidents of Yale and Princeton, met in New York recently to explore ways to use the influence of their trustees to help make their case.

Universities acknowledge that the importance of foreign students is not obvious to the public, which has security concerns after one of the Sept. 11 hijackers entered the country on a student visa. Some may wonder why foreign students take up 600,000 slots in American universities in the first place.

But administrators insist those slots are as important now as ever.

"This is one of America's most effective forms of diplomacy," said Douglas Kincaid, vice provost for international studies at Florida International

Gunmen attack former UN office

By ALBERT AJI
ASSOCIATED PRESS

DAMASCUS, Syria (AP) — Gunmen attacked a former United Nations office in a diplomatic quarter of Damascus, setting off a battle with police that pelted nearby buildings with bullets and grenades.

The fighting killed two attackers, a policeman and a civilian, the government said.

Syria has not seen such violence since the 1980s, when the government put down an insurgency by Islamic militants.

The vacant building was formerly occupied by the U.N. Disengagement Observer Force, which oversees an agreement between Israeli and Syrian forces in the Golan Heights. It was extensively damaged by fire during the gunbattle.

"Unidentified terrorists attacked a U.N. office building in Damascus and this office is surrounded by many embassies as well," Syria's ambassador to Washington, Imad Moustapha, said in a telephone interview from Washington.

Moustapha said it was too early to know the motivation of the attackers or whether they were Islamist.

"There was a random exchange of fire and probably every building in that area was hit by a grenade or a bullet" before security forces surrounded the area and returned fire, he said.

Syria's official news agency SANA, quoting a security source, called the attackers "a terrorist band."

The Al-Arabiya television network said there were four attackers. It said three were killed and one wounded. The report could not be immediately confirmed.

After the gunbattle, large crowds gathered to catch a glimpse of the damaged building. Youths drove by honking car horns, waving pictures of Syrian President Bashar Assad and chanting pro-Syrian and pro-Assad slogans.

In New York, Marie Okabe, a U.N. spokeswoman, said all U.N. staff and facilities were safe and accounted for.

The U.N. headquarters in Baghdad, the capital of neighboring Iraq, was bombed twice after the U.S.-led war last year. The first, on Aug. 19, killed 22 people including top U.N. envoy Sergio Vieira de Mello.

Witnesses, who said the violence started about 7:20 p.m. and lasted 70 minutes, gave different reports that could not immediately be reconciled.

One witness said four gunmen came out of a white van on the main Mazza Boulevard in front of the Canadian Embassy and started shooting indiscriminately. A police car on patrol in the area rushed to the scene and came under fire. The police shot back and police and plainclothes security forces reinforcements arrived, the witness said.

Three gunmen were killed and a fourth was taken into custody, the witness reported. Five cars were gutted and there was a fire at the building where the United Nations used to have offices. Police explosives experts were brought to the scene to examine the bodies of the dead gunmen to make sure they were not booby-trapped.

Another witness said the attackers were riding in two cars. Two explosions were first heard and a heavy exchange of fire ensued. More than 15 explosions followed, said the witness.

On eve of anniversary, legislature aims to prevent oil spills

ASSOCIATED PRESS

An oil-covered loon sits in stark contrast to the rocks it has settled upon at Horseneck Beach in Westport, on April 29, 2003.

BOSTON (AP) — A panel of lawmakers and environmentalists marked the one-year anniversary of the Buzzards Bay oil spill by proposing strict new guidelines for oil tankers entering the bay, including some of the steepest fines in the country for companies that violate the rules.

Bouchard Transportation agreed to pay a record $10 million fine for the April 27, 2003, spill, which killed birds and coated miles of coastline with black tar after a barge drifted out of Cape Cod Canal and ripped a gash in its hull, spilling at least 55,000 gallons of oil.

"I hope that on each anniversary of this date, we remember our commitment to protect the environment," said Rep. Mark Howland, D-Freetown, at a news conference Tuesday to unveil the legislation.

The legislation would raise the bond for hazardous cargo from a current low of $25,000 to $50 million and provide financial incentives for using double hulls, which protect against spills.

It also would impose a fee on oil shipments of no more than 2 cents per barrel for a $10 million Oil Spill Prevention and Response Fund and dramatically increase civil and criminal penalties for spills.

The bill was developed by the Buzzards Bay Oil Spill Commission, which included lawmakers from both parties as well as two representatives of the Romney administration.

State Environmental Affairs Secretary Ellen Roy Herzfelder, a member of the commission, called the legislation "a great example of a bipartisan approach to a critical issue."

"Our state is the Bay State and every bay and coast line is of special interest," Herzfelder said.

House Speaker Thomas Finneran, D-Boston, predicted that the bill "will be very, very well received in the House."

Bomb victims dying in North Korea hospitals due to lack of medicine, aid

By STEPHANIE HOO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BEIJING (AP) — Victims of a North Korean train explosion, their skin charred and faces blackened by chemical burns, are wasting away in hospitals with little medicine, aid workers said Tuesday in a plea for more help.

But North Korea rejected doctors from rival South Korea, the Seoul government said.

The North said it would, however, accept cement and diesel fuel from South Korea, and estimated property damage at $356 million in the city of Ryongchon, where it said last week's explosion was equal to 100 one-ton bombs.

The official North Korean news agency KCNA said the blast destroyed at least 8,100 homes and more than 30 public buildings.

International aid agencies have not put a price tag on reconstruction. The North's damage estimate is far above what donors have promised, fueling speculation that Pyongyang is trying to gain as much aid as possible.

"Aside from the reconstruction operations, North Korea is generally facing serious economic problems," said Koh Yu-hwan, a South Korean expert on the North. "Through this incident, it probably ... hopes to get assistance."

The death toll from Thursday's blast stood at 161, including 76 children from one destroyed school. More than 1,300 people were injured and many more were left homeless, aid agencies said.

On Tuesday, relief workers described people struggling to rebuild with their bare hands.

GERALD BOURKE/ASSOCIATED PRESS

Unidentified injured victims of Thursday's train explosion lay on beds at the People's hospital in Sinuiju, North Korea, Sunday.

Getting more food, blankets and medicine to the injured and homeless are among the priorities, aid workers said.

Intern work can build future career understood the importance of establishing myself, of making a reputation, of creating a foundation for my future experiences to build on," Filipowski says. "I wanted to narrow down my career goals, to see whether or not I was moving in the right direction."

B.J. Roche, the faculty member who coordinates journalism department internships emphasized their importance.

"Those who hire for journalism jobs want to know that a student can write well for publication. The more clips, the more experience a student has, the better. Internships are a good way to get all that."

"My goal as internship coordinator in this department is to get every student to do an internship before they leave school," Roche said. "I see a lot of seniors this time of year who have no clips, no journalism experience, and who think that the degree alone will get them the job. This is just no longer true, so I can't stress enough the importance of an internship."

Real-life experience can be the difference between being offered a job and being passed by, she said.

It's this very reason that some colleges require their students to participate in an internship to graduate. Paid internships are a mandatory part of the associate's degrees offered by the Stockbridge School at UMass and are completed between the first and second years.

According to Nancy Garrabrants, director of the Stockbridge School, internships provide students with a wider breadth of knowledge.

"We tell students that if they worked somewhere before college, [they should] look into working somewhere else to build a resume. There is some difference in how public vs. private organizations work, so it gives them a variety of career options," if they intern at varied organizations. The experience gained through internships is so successful that Stockbridge has 100 percent placement of students after graduation, according to Garrabrants.

Brian Schwartz, College of Engineering academic advisor emphasized the importance to engineering majors of either co-op placements or research with faculty.

"There is a definite correlation between students who participate in co-ops and how well they do in getting job placements and more job offers, although research [in engineering] also helps," Schwartz said. Some students seem to underestimate the importance of experience in actually landing a job, Schwartz said.

Silver agreed that the more experience students have, the broader their network of connections to jobs is likely to be after graduation.

"You'll have the resumes, the contacts

vided inadequate health care for workers in Africa. For a long time, the company failed to provide HIV/AIDS care for its employees in Africa. The Health Global Access Project assessed that in October 2003, programs had been installed on paper, but only five of the 55 nations had launched the actual program.

Coca-Cola has been in and out of the court systems in India over the past few years for contamination and abuse of the water resources in India. In the original letter sent to the UMass administration, the Radical Student Union said, "Coke's factories in several Indian communities have used so much of the available water local water resources that villagers have to walk six miles to get water." This was based on research from the India Resource Center.

"I'd fully believe it. Coca-Cola is the devil," said Emily Russel, sophomore and President of the Cannabis Reform Coalition, when hearing the charges against Coca-Cola. The protest against Coca-Cola here at the University comes as an extension of the international boycott of Coca-Cola known as the, "Killer Coke" campaign that began on July 22. Colleges and universities who are protesting Coca-Cola are now joining a nation-wide protest.

"We're not asking for a boycott, said Kathleen Clifford, a freshman Social Thought and Political Economy major. "We're not criminalizing those who drink it because there's not really any other choice on campus."

The Radical Student Union is sponsoring a discussion tonight at 8 p.m. in Campus Center 168C. Speakers will include Ray Rogers, director of the campaign to "Stop Killer Coke!" and corporate campaign; Terry Collingsworth, International Labor Rights Fund executive director; and Dan Kovalik, Assistant General Counsel of the US Steelworkers who filed lawsuit for SINALTRAINBEC. A rally to gain student support for the protest against Coke will be held at noon on Thursday outside the Student Union.

and moving out of town," said Tony Banbury, Asia regional director for the World Food Program.

Hospitals lack even basic supplies, like intravenous drips, and Banbury said he saw patients whose "skin was charred and ripped off." Others had chemical burns on their faces, and doctors told him at least five people were blinded, he said.

Video released by the United Nations showed patients squeezed two to a bed. Many had compresses on their eyes and facial injuries from being struck by a wave of glass, rubble and heat in Ryongchon, a city of 130,000 not far from the Chinese border.

More than 1,000 students attended a school that was destroyed by the blast, and the U.N. Children's Fund was looking for buildings where classes could be held, said Pierette Vulthi, UNICEF'S representative in the North Korean capital, Pyongyang.

"We know that for children who have been traumatized going to school restores a sense of normalcy," she said.

The United States, China and Japan are among nations that have offered aid, and Germany said it would donate $119,000 to buy food and building materials.

"The biggest need at the moment is for antibiotics, eye drops and burn kits," World Health Organization spokeswoman Fadela Chaib said in Geneva.

University in Miami, where foreign enrollment is down 10 percent. "We're educating people who will be in influential positions in science and industry and government around the world."

More than 90 percent of graduate schools reported their foreign applications for this fall declined, according to a survey of 113 universities last month by the Council of Graduate Schools.

Undergraduate applications also are down, but not as much, likely because fewer undergraduates plan to work on sensitive technologies that require a more thorough background check.

Feeling the effects are big, public universities and elite, private ones like Harvard, whose president, Lawrence Summers, reported a sharp drop in international applications to each of Harvard's nine schools in a recent letter to federal officials.

Many schools count on foreign students to teach classes and fill labs.

"We don't have domestic students to take their place, mostly in fields like science and technology," said Stephen Dunnett, vice president for international education at the University at Buffalo, part of New York's state university system. The school has 3,600 foreign students, with applications down one-third this year.

and the connections to get the job," he said.

Not all majors require students to complete an internship or co-op, but may have other required experience tied to graduation. Joy Holthut, office manager for communication disorders, said most undergrads in her department don't do internships because of extensive course requirements, but must have clinical observation hours to graduate. Some communication disorders students who get ahead of their coursework can do internships or work with clients, Holthut said. As with other majors, she added, how determined a student is to get an internship makes a huge difference in getting a job.

Schwartz said individual initiative is a huge factor in the amount of experience students get. "How active a student is will affect how successful they are at getting the placement they want."

Roche agreed that initiative is important, not only to getting a placement, but in proving that one is a motivated candidate.

"When you graduate, you want to have more to show than just a degree —you want to show that you are not only experienced, but that you can succeed, that you are dependable, that you have a deep interest and passion for your field of study," Roche said. "Internships enable you to convey that."

Filipowski agreed that initiative is essential for a successful internship, and highly recommends using the resources on campus.

"Career Services is an absolutely fantastic resource that I think a lot of students on campus are not aware of," Filipowski said. "I only became aware of it on accident. The career counselors and advisors are there to help you with internships, jobs and any other concerns you may have about life in the world that is not confined to UMass' campus. People should use it."

And you don't have to have a major that automatically produces a career, either. Many students major in one thing and want to pursue a career in another discipline. Silver emphasizes that internships can be anything you want them to be.

"Arts and science majors can do anything," Silver said. "It doesn't matter what your major is. I've had history majors work in business." Internships and co-ops are what you want them to be, and Silver encourages students to do fieldwork throughout their academic careers.

"You should start your sophomore year and do multiple internships," Silver said. "Do part-time internships sophomore and junior year and then a full-time internship your senior year."

Bustamante the best for SGA president

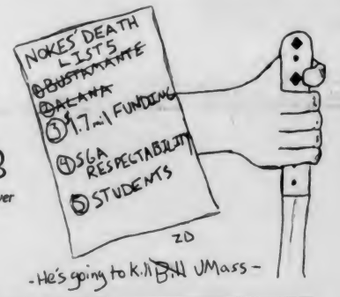
Four weeks ago today, The Massachusetts Daily Collegian ran an unsigned staff editorial outlining the difficulties facing Student Government Association President-Elect Eduardo Bustamante. The piece, written on the eve of what seemed like it should have been his presidential inauguration, said Bustamante's first priority as president needed to be mending rifts both between factions of student government and between the SGA and the student body itself.

As student government elections begin again today, the student body knows that through no fault of his own, Bustamante has been unable to fulfill those goals. The results of the last elections were declared unconstitutional, the elections were never ratified and Bustamante was never sworn in as president.

While the elections format has changed in the elections that begin today, the issues that concerned The Collegian most remain the same — they're just amplified. The rift between student body and student government has grown larger than ever, and the politics played between liberal and conservative members of the SGA have continued to sour since that night of March 31, with accusations levied by both sides on numerous issues.

As an observer of this power struggle, The Collegian can do little to end the nonsense other than to strongly urge students to vote in elections today or tomorrow in either the Campus Center or one of your various dining commons.

When you do that, however, we also urge you to consider the following: we believe Eduardo Bustamante to be the best choice for students today and tomorrow as they cast their votes for SGA president.



Over the last few weeks, Bustamante has proven himself to be a graceful, yet fiery leader for a large contingent of supporters. In a student government where the most common reaction from students is confusion, disgust or complete unadulterated apathy, that in itself speaks volumes for Bustamante's leadership skills. The majority of his support has come not from insiders' familiar with the SGA's bureaucracy, but from rank-and-file students taking an interest in campus politics for the first time ever. That kind of grassroots campaign is likely to serve the student body well, and give us a government truly for the people.

Arguments have been made that Bustamante's close association with the Office of ALANA Affairs past and present could get in the way of bettering the campus as a whole if he is elected. Based on past partisan politics in the SGA, these concerns are understandable. The 10-point platform of Bustamante and fellow running mate Matthew Murphy, however, offers numerous suggestions that point to the pair brainstorming ideas for students in general, including a plan for a progressive textbook campaign that, at the very least, is well worth exploring. While supporting the Office of ALANA Affairs will certainly be one focus of any Bustamante administration, it's hard to believe it would be the only one.

Opponents have also attacked Bustamante for being anti-Commonwealth College — something we finds hard to believe, especially considering Bustamante himself is listed as a student in the honors program. A Collegian review of the videotaped meeting when opponents say Bustamante called the Commonwealth College "elitist" revealed no such statement by the candidate.

If elected, Bustamante's biggest obstacle will be a relative lack of experience — an obstacle compounded by the current hostilities in SGA politics right now. It can be overcome, however. As long as he chooses a well-rounded and knowledgeable Executive Cabinet, a fresh outlook with more open lines of dialogue between the student body, the SGA should more than compensate for any growing pains experienced. Given the choices on the ballot, Bustamante's energy and progressivism translate the best to when it comes to what our student body needs right now.

Flag unveiled before its time

Scott Eldridge II

The U.S.-backed Iraqi governing council — a board of appointees who are hard at work framing a new government for the country — has stumbled across its priorities.

While Iraqis are dying from bombs and bullets the governing council has emerged with a new flag for Iraq. A flag, a piece of fabric that will effectively do nothing to stop insurgents, terrorist actions, fighting, death or injury from a war.

A flag, a waving symbol of a country that, for the most part, has yet to be created.

A flag that has effectively angered the populous it was stitched to unite.

This flag has several features that the old flag did not. Instead of a red, white and black striped field with a Takbir inscription (it reads "Allah Akbar," or "God is great") the newly designed banner has a white field, with a pale blue crescent moon in the center, and a yellow strip with two blue borders running across the bottom. For symbolism, the crescent moon is supposed to represent Islam, the two blue strips are stand-ins for the Tigris and Euphrates rivers and the strip of yellow, Kurdistan and the Kurdish population of Northern Iraq.

Before totally criticizing the flag and it's unveiling, a moment of patriotism: Flags are terribly important. They can stand as tangible symbols for people who are looking for a reason to believe in a country. The flag of a country is likely to invoke emotion from its colors, its visibility. A flag can give you something visual to rally behind, it can mean any number of things to any number of people. Even burning a flag has a very pointed message.

So, to be clear, flags are important fixtures for any country and government and people. But not in Iraq. Not now. Not yet.

From National Public Radio reporting I heard complaints ranging from "this is not our flag" to "it looks like the flag of Sweden."

While it's easy to chuckle at the Swedes color choices influencing Iraq's banner, it is not too far from the rumors. Iraqis, who are supposed to be represented by this cloth, feel that the pale blue crescent is either a symbol of the United Nations, who use the color, or Israel, which also has blue in their flag.

These are both contentious issues. The United Nations interpretation could stand for a long occupation by the multinational force to some Iraqis, the Israel interpretation only furthers the staunch rift between fudaism and Islam and Mideast peace.

This flag, in its unveiling, will likely do the opposite of what a flag should do: unite. It has already riled up the Iraqi people who saw it, for the first time, in their morning newspapers.

The blue lines representing the rivers, probably not horribly upsetting as they are bodies of water and less political than historical and crucial geographically.

But those blue lines border a strip of yellow that stands for the much debated Kurdistan and the Kurdish population that, while in Iraq, is a largely autonomous group. There is no colored strip for Sunnis or Shiites, two divisions of Islam that are well defined in Iraq and sometimes at odds.

So this flag, in its unveiling, will likely do the opposite of what a flag should do: unite. It has already riled up the Iraqi people who saw it, for the first time, in their morning newspapers.

Worse yet, is that the flag was stitched while fighting between Iraqis, insurgent groups and American and coalition forces has steadily risen. Mosques are being fortified, and weapons stockpiled. Entourages and convoys are being attacked. Troops are dying on the U.S. side and civilians, the group of Iraqis the governing council should be worried about, are dying in these attacks — often at much higher rates than the military personnel who are contracted for the fighting.

Now, it is conceivable and likely that the council is focused on ridding Iraq of violence. I'm fairly positive that Paul Bremmer, who was appointed by Bush as a civilian administrator, would like to see less violence. It would be immature to say that the flag was treated more urgently than the end to fighting, but it could have waited a little longer and been better handled. Even if the governing powers are focused on the fighting, the people get the impression that the flag is more important, that it is somehow a band-aid for the distraught country.

Democratically, the flag design appears to lack the approval of many Iraqis. Was the input of the civilian body sought? It would seem that some proposals or suggestions from a soon-to-be democratic government would have been a better way to handle the issue and the input of the future voter pool couldn't hurt.

Waving a flag as a representation of a country that has not yet been solidified comes across now as a diversion or a bandage over a very sore wound. Whatever the logic might have been, the public impact should be a notice to the governing council that this country does not need a flag to wave behind its people.

It needs people to stand behind its flag.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

DUH TEST FOR PRESIDENT

I wish to announce that I have devised and administered a little test that can be used to determine who is, and who is not, qualified to be president of the United Sates of America, leader of the free world and commander in chief of any expeditionary forces to be sent to the planet Mars. I refer to the test as "defining uno honcho," or D.U.H. for short. So that you can self-administer the test, I provide a copy below:

So duh, the TEST: President Bush, as affirmed by National Security Advisor Condoleezza Rice in sworn public testimony, says that had he know that planes were going to fly into the Twin Towers and the Pentagon he would have done something about it. How about you?

The results of my research have been startling. Thus far, every red-blooded, warm-blooded American has given the right answer. It sort of makes one proud, doesn't it? Duh!

WHY YOU SHOULD CARE ABOUT THE INTERNATIONAL STUDENT FEE

Most of you have probably read about the international student fee in the papers, seen the protests on campus, or heard about it through television or radio. You've heard the arguments international students have presented about why we are outraged by the imposition of this fee, and you've heard the arguments from the administration about why it was out of their hands and made necessary by the budget situation. While I could — and at other times have — debated these issues, what I would like to do here is to try and explain why the average University of Massachusetts student or community member should care about the imposition of this fee.

The presence of international students on this campus is of value to the community as a whole in a very real sense. I am not only talking about diversity and exposure to other cultures that members of the UMass community benefit from, nor am I talking about the fees, taxes and purchases that international students pay into the local and state economy. The benefit I want to emphasize here is that the vast majority of international students work on this campus; they do a very large chunk of the teaching and research on this campus, and indeed in the United States.

If international students were no longer welcome on this campus, then the research and teaching pool of this university would shrink dramatically. This will translate into either higher fees to students in order to be able to attract the same caliber of students from a smaller pool, or a reduction in quality and service on this campus because the university is forced to recruit either fewer, or less qualified applicants.

You may or may not agree with the imposition of the international student fee. You may or may not agree with the reasons why international students are outraged by the fee. One thing that is clear is that international students are outraged by the imposition of this fee, and that international applications to UMass have dropped dramatically (by more than 40 percent according to the international programs office) in the last year. The university may start reporting us to the department of homeland security for refusing to pay the international student fee soon, and if they do then that will lead to deportations. If you care about having us on this campus, then you need to act now, because you'll probably miss us when we're gone.

IN FAVOR OF NON-GORY IRAQI WAR PHOTOS

I was frustrated upon reading Allison Edles' column in The Massachusetts Daily Collegian on Monday, in reference to the controversy surrounding pictures of flag-borne coffins of deceased American soldiers that were released to the public by the media late last week. In two sections, Edles spoke first of the impact of the release of these photos on the mourning process of the families of the deceased, and in a second section compared this media coverage to what at times seemed like the gratuitous portrayal of American deaths during the attacks of Sept. 11. Although I appreciate her sentiments regarding both of these topics, I also found significant fault with her reasoning on both issues.

There is a basic faulty assumption underlying this article: that the American public at large is aware of the total volume of the deaths of American soldiers in Iraq. Prior to this recent media coverage, the public for the most part has learned of military deaths anonymously and unremarkably, with a brief announcement on the early-morning news, statting a daily death count of one or two. This leaves us without a sense of the total loss to our armed forces, which has been significant.

Non-gory visual images, such as the photos of flag-draped coffins in question serve as compelling evidence of the actual sacrifice borne by American soldiers thus far in the war in Iraq, evidence that the media has been in general all too willing to marginalize and ignore. Although we have heard about Jessica Lynch and more recently Michelle Witmer, for the most part our soldiers in Iraq have remained anonymous and the greater summation of their loss of life has been obscured. For this reason, I think that these pictures constitute a new, essential type of media coverage of this war, and are in no way analogous to the extensive media coverage of Sept. 11.

Furthermore, this recent media coverage is also much more productive. As citizens, these soldiers are in Iraq fighting on our behalf. Although I have boundless respect for the sacrifice that these individuals have made and continue to make for our country, I think the most respect I can give them as a citizen manifests itself best in a continual awareness of this sacrifice within the greater political context of our nation. Unlike in the Sept. 11 attacks, in this instance we are not innocent and helpless victims. As citizens of this nation, it is clearly our duty to view this truth for what it is and evaluate and perhaps modify our political behavior accordingly. In order to carry out this process it is important that we know the truth and weigh all the factors.

Edles refers twice to the journalistic tendency to cover "every little thing," to "spare no minor detail" as if this is an excuse for the release of the photos in the first place; she fails to acknowledge that the content and implication of these photos is hardly gratuitous or minor. They are in fact filling a void of information in the mainstream media that is sorely needed in the formation of an informed electorate.

I recently decided to go check out the Monkey Bar after its "Grand Re-Opening" and write up a little review. I'm not gonna lie. I've been there before and (this isn't something I'll openly tell just anyone), I had an awesome time. It's basically like going to a Dave Matthews concert. You can't understand a damn word while you're in there, and there's a bunch of people that are way too into it, so if you're sober it'll be two of the most miserable hours of your life. But if you're already hammered by the time you go in, even though you won't remember most of what happened, when you wake up you'll have this weird feeling that you had a really good time. And when you roll over, you just hope that the random girl next to you feels the same way.

The funny thing is ... I didn't even get into the damn place. I sat in line for 20 minutes and gave up because I forgot to bring lawn chairs and a hibachi. They say there's no such thing as bad press, and for the Monkey Bar's sake, I really hope that's true.

Dear Monkey Bar,

Your bar sucks. We may be drunk, but we're not stupid. We see what you're trying to do with this line-out-the-door-at-all-times idea. But guess what? This isn't New York City. It's Amherst, the same town that managed to sell out a Toby Keith show a month ago.

You want people to think, "Wow, people will actually wait in line to get in there. I should go there to get wasted too." But you need to realize that this is exactly what your bar means to us students: a place to get wasted. People can't get wasted while waiting in line. Instead, they just get cold and amazingly sober. I hate to point out the obvious, but sober people plus more people outside than actually in the bar equals less money for you.

If everyone thought that in reality, your establishment was overcrowded, then it wouldn't be much of a problem, but you see, your bar has windows. We can see that there are three people buying drinks, so you're fooling absolutely no one. To prevent this, just treat the bar like your bouncers treat their '97 Honda Civics (that they drive like standards, even though they're automatics) and tint the windows.

Moving on to your bouncers ... We know that you've been trained to pick out a fake ID. But here's a head's up: this isn't a very difficult skill, and judging from all the Amherst Regional High School Cheerleaders I've seen at the bar, you pretty much suck at it.

We know that you somehow manage to get girls, but picking them up by telling them you can get them into the Monkey Bar without waiting in line is just cheesy.

We know that if you had a young daughter, and you showed up at the breakfast table without gelling your hair first, she'd probably cry because she didn't recognize her daddy.

We know that the headset you wear while "bouncing" is a damn prop. Here's how I know. In those 15 minutes I wasted waiting in line, I didn't hear you say the word, "Over" or "Roger" once, and when it comes to using two-way radios of any kind, that's just the cool thing to do. You're not in the Secret Service, and no one on our basketball team is good enough to require a bodyguard anymore, so put the earpiece away. It's just something they give you to make you feel like more of a badass. Honestly, why would you need a headset: to know if there's a fight inside? How about you just take the hint when the midget crashes through the front window and lands on the poor suckers waiting in line.

We know that you shop at Express For Men. To be honest, I want nothing to do with a store that needs to put "For Men" in the title to help the buyer discriminate which gender the store intends to clothe. I should be able to walk into a store, glance at both sides, and be able to determine which half of the store is made for humans with penises. If Express and Express For Men were combined, that would be incredibly difficult, and I have a problem with that. If a shirt is tight, $65, and has a pattern that looks like a baby spit up strained carrots all over the front, then it's from that store. If you look at a shirt and it makes you wonder, "God, do we really need more shoelaces on sweaters?" then it's from that store.

So in conclusion, I'm happy that all of the hard work you bouncers put in at the John Quincy Adams Wellness Center has paid off, but seriously, get over yourselves. Waiting in line sucks, so just let us in so we can drink and dance to that same Lil' Jon song over and over again. We'll be a lot happier and it'll make you look like less of a bastard. If not, we'll just go to one of the five other places in that 200-foot stretch of sidewalk. I, for one, will be just as happy drinking Pabst Blue Ribbon bottles at Delano's. Just trying to help you out.

I love you,
Matt

Pat Tillman: A true hero?

The extraordinary life of an ordinary man is remembered

Matthew Reid

The world of professional sports is filled with larger-than-life figures. Professional athletes have come to represent epic figures in our society, both literally and figuratively. Yao Ming, of the Houston Rockets, stands 7 feet, 6 inches tall. Ted Washington, of the Oakland Raiders, weighs 365 pounds. And while Alex Rodriguez may look like a regular person, the $252 million contract that he signed in 2000 as a member of the Texas Rangers was anything but ordinary.

Then, there's Pat Tillman.

Tillman is a former safety with the Arizona Cardinals. He turned down a three-year, $3.6 million contract in May 2002 to join the elite Army Rangers. According to their Web site, www.ranger.org, the Rangers are "an infantry force whose soldiers serve as shock troops, raiders and commandos who strike behind enemy lines. Every Ranger volunteers for the duty and must pass rigorous physical tests to serve."

Tillman decided to enlist, along with his brother, Kevin, a former minor league baseball prospect in the Cleveland Indians organization.

I had heard of Pat Tillman before he enlisted with the Rangers, but I didn't know much about his character. I knew of his abilities on the football field, but knew little about what kind of man he was. Then I heard the news that he was leaving pro football to fight overseas. It was one of the most selfless things I had heard of coming out of pro sports in quite some time. It was a shock to me, and to many other sports fan. But for some reason, I knew he'd return one day and get back to playing the game he loved. After all, he was invincible, right?

Then I hear the news last Thursday that Pat Tillman had been killed in action in Afghanistan, almost two years after he enlisted with the Rangers. He was 27.

At first, I didn't know how to react. I was saddened, of course. I was also a little angry. Then I felt proud. I was proud that I lived in a country that could produce a man such as Pat Tillman. I felt proud that I lived in a country that Pat Tillman considered good enough to fight, and ultimately die, for.

Tillman died in a war that many people don't support. However, you don't have to support the war in order to support Tillman himself. Partisan politics is not the issue. The issue for Tillman was that by joining the Rangers, he could support this country better than he could by playing football.

Following the Sept. 11 attacks, Tillman said, "I was dumbfounded by everything that was going on. In times like this, you think about how good we have it and what kind of a system we live under, what freedoms we are allowed.

A lot of my family has gone and fought in wars and I haven't really done a damn thing as far as laying myself on the line like that."

So Tillman laid himself on the line, and died fighting for his country.

Was his death unfortunate? Absolutely — the world needs more people like Pat Tillman in it. But was his death in vain? Absolutely not. His death proved that democracy is worth fighting for, even if you don't believe in every decision made by those in charge. His death made us all reconsider what it means to be an American.

In a world of athletes who are all talk and no action, Tillman was the complete opposite. He never gave a real explanation for his decision to join the Rangers. He didn't want the public to make a big deal out of an ordinary man going off and fighting in the war, when so many ordinary men fight and die each day. He didn't charge onto the battlefield like a madman, trying to kill as many Afghanis as possible; he simply upped and left to defend his country in the best way he knew how.

If Pat Tillman were watching, he most likely would disapprove of the proposed plan to dedicate the entire upcoming NFL season to him. And he certainly would object to columns such as this, which make him out to be a hero. However, it's impossible to describe Pat Tillman without using some hyperbole. He is not a hero because he was an extraordinary man. He is a hero because he was an ordinary man that did extraordinary things. His heroism has nothing to do with his death, but with his life.

In a world of bloated contracts and steroid-filled muscles, Tillman embodied everything that is good about professional sports, and he did it without saying a word. He never demanded more money and he never violated a team policy. He never did anything that would make himself stand out on his team, except play hard.

He never tried to be a hero on the battlefield, either. He went about his business with quiet dignity and unquestioned honor, never letting his own intrinsic desires dictate his decisions. Tillman's death moved grown men, such as my father, to tears not because the death itself was so heroic, but because his life was so overwhelming.

Pat Tillman's unassuming nature made him seem ordinary, but in reality he was anything but. The fact that he was ordinary is exactly what made him stand out. It's what made him taller than Yao Ming, and it was what made him richer than A-Rod. It's what made him a true hero.

Pat Tillman is not a hero: he got what was coming to him

When the death of Pat Tillman occurred, I turned to my friend who was watching the news with me and said, "How much you want to bet they start talking about him as a 'hero' in about two hours?" Of course, my friend did not want to make that bet. He'd lose. In this self-critical incapable nation, nothing but a knee-jerk "He's a hero" response is to be expected.

Rene Gonzalez

I've been mystified at the absolute nonsense of being in "awe" of Tillman's "sacrifice" that has been the American response. Mystified, but not surprised. True, it's not everyday that you forgo a $3.6 million contract for joining the military. And, not just the regular army, but the elite Army Rangers. You know he was a real Rambo, who wanted to be in the "real" thick of things. I could tell he was that type of macho guy from his scowling, beefy face on the CNN pictures. Well, he got his wish. Even Rambo got shot in the third movie, but in real life, you die as a result of being shot. They should call Pat Tillman's army life "Rambo 4: Rambo Attempts to Strike Back at His Former Rambo 3 Taliban Friends, and Gets Killed."

But, does that make him a hero? I guess it's a matter of perspective. For people in the United States, who seem to be unable to admit the stupidity of both the Afghanistan and Iraqi wars, such a trade-off in life standards (if not expectancy) is nothing short of heroic. Obviously, the man must be made of "stronger stuff" to have had decided to "serve" his country rather than take from it. It's the old JFK exhortation to citizen service to the nation, and it seems to strike an emotional chord. So, it's understandable why Americans automatically knee-jerk into hero worship.

However, in my neighborhood in Puerto Rico, Tillman would have been called a "pendejo," an idiot. Tillman, in the absurd belief that he was defending or serving his all-powerful country from a seventh-rate, Third World nation devastated by the previous conflicts it had endured, decided to give up a comfortable life to place himself in a combat situation that cost him his life. This was not "Ramon or Tyrone," who joined the military out of financial necessity, or to have a chance at education. This was a "G.I. Joe" guy who got what was coming to him. That was not heroism, it was prophetic idiocy.

Tillman, probably acting out his nationalist-patriotic fantasies forged in years of exposure to Clint Eastwood and Rambo movies, decided to insert himself into a conflict he didn't need to insert himself into. It wasn't like he was defending the East coast from an invasion of a foreign power. That would have been heroic and laudable. What he did was make himself useful to a foreign invading army, and be paid for it. It's hard to say I have any sympathy for his death because I don't feel like his "service" was necessary. He wasn't defending me, nor was he defending the Afghani people. He was acting out his macho, patriotic crap and I guess someone with a bigger gun did him in.

Perhaps it's the old, dreamy American thought process that forces them to put sports greats and "larger than life" sacrificial lambs on the pedestal of heroism, no matter what they've done. After all, the American nation has no other role to play but to be the cheerleaders of the home team; a sad role to have to play during conflicts that suffer from severe legitimacy and credibility problems.

Matters are a little clearer for those living outside the American borders. Tillman got himself killed in a country other than his own without having been forced to go over to that country to kill its people. After all, whether we like them or not, the Taliban is more Afghani than we are. Their resistance is more legitimate than our invasion, regardless of the fact that our social values are probably more enlightened than theirs. For that, he shouldn't be hailed as a hero, he should be used as a poster boy for the dangerous consequences of too much "America is #1," frat boy, propaganda bull. It might just make a regular man irrationally drop $3.6 million to go fight in a conflict that was anything but "self-defense." The same could be said of the unusual belief of 50 percent of the American nation that thinks Saddam Hussein was behind Sept. 11. One must indeed stand in awe of the amazing success of the American propaganda machine. It works wonders.

Al-Qaeda won't be defeated in Afghanistan, even if we did kill all their operatives there. Only through careful and logical changing of the underlying conditions that allow for the ideology to foster will Al-Qaeda be defeated. Ask the Israelis if 50 years of blunt force have eradicated the Palestinian resistance. For that reason, Tillman's service, along with that of thousands of American soldiers, has been wrongly utilized.

He did die in vain, because in the years to come, we will realize the irrationality of the War on Terror and the American reaction to Sept. 11. The sad part is that we won't realize it before we send more people like Pat Tillman over to their deaths.

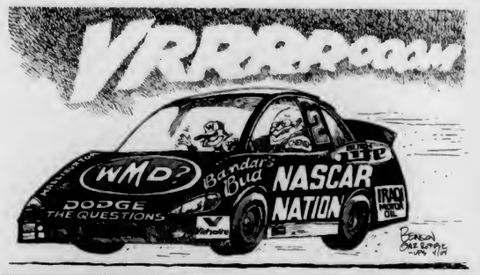
The rules of cool at UMass

As you all know, the daily (or semi-daily, depending on whether or not you manage to free from your endlessly hectic schedule) trek to and from class can pose a certain anxiety about your popularity level in this insanely immense university environment. If you have been apprehensive about this process in the past, it is because you are outside the loop. The unwritten rules of campus coolness are a great guide for people looking to advance themselves in terms of public image and/or the bubbling social scene that this university has to offer. And now the secret's out — because I'm writing them down.

Dylan Smith

This is decidedly the most significant event of the year (forget about People's 50 Most Beautiful People that people love to look at and talk about). These rules are merely guidelines — once you learn the basics, you can bend them to your liking.

Rule 1: Always carry your cellular phone (cutely referred to as "celly," "mobile" or the boldly flamboyant "bling-blings/bling-blinga") as if it were some piece of 12-pound pure gold jewelry dangling from P. Diddy's neck around campus at all times. This cannot be stressed enough. And always leave this device on during class. I don't care if this lecture is a dreadfully boring 400-person intro course studying underwater basket weaving or if it is an intense seminar discussing the serious implications of the Sept. 11 attacks. It does not matter. When you receive a little ring-ringy on your bling-blingy in the middle of class-classy, (and you will, due to the carefully arranged calling schedule you and your holla-ing friends have devised) your popularity and coolness will move up a notch on the popularity and coolness gauge that can be found somewhere in a high-rise dorm room in Southwest. People are fervently keeping statistics on this.



Rule 2: Maintain a demeanor that would exemplify a cool person. When strolling through campus, never make eye contact with any other students. I recommend a target on the ground approximately five feet in front of you. This way you avoid the class hike collision, a rather embarrassing experience, not to mention a severe dent in your quest for coolness.

This way of carrying yourself not only allows you to concentrate on important things, like making sure you are ashing your cigarette in a cool way (flicking the back with your thumb) or thinking through all the motions of your well versed strut, but it also gives other people who are taking notice (and believe me, they are) a chance to witness your coolness in breathtaking fashion. "Swingers" puts it best with their "act like you don't need it, and they give you it for free" philosophy, and I don't think I need to tell you what happened at the Black Jack table on their Vegas trip.

Rule 3: The last and final rule in the most important three-pronged list that you will ever encounter in your lifetime (the nerdy kids say that "stop, drop, and roll" ranks pretty high up there, but let's be honest, rolling around on the ground?) I say brush away that spunky, quick-to-leave-you-scarred-and-disfigured-with-first-degree-burns conflagration, shrug your shoulders like the Fonz, light up a cig and proclaim, "I inhale more smoke than those weak California wildfires could produce in a week." (Trust me guys. The gender of your preference will come flocking.)

But enough of these parenthetical asides that leave sentence fragments begging for the benefits and luxuries that full sentences enjoy to the nth degree. Digression will only get you one thing in life, and that is the doomed pseudo hell that a Ph.D. is suffering through right now, unable to connect with us, the cool kids of the University of Massachusetts. Because he or she will never know what it's like to walk, talk and most importantly, smoke like he or she is the greatest thing in the world — or the more eloquent utterance that I prefer — feces. It's sad, this I know. The loop was never within their grasp. But now it is.

Let's not 'kill' great literature

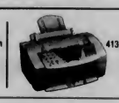
Amie Colcord

One of the greatest disgraces in the world is the banning of books from school systems. For school councils to ban books is to deprive students of an art form from which they can gain new perspectives. In particular, the classic novel "To Kill A Mockingbird" is banned in numerous school systems across the country. Harper Lee's novel is full of educational themes ranging from racism to the socially abnormal family life of the Finches. Shading students' eyes from the controversial issues of the world will not stop reality from taking place. Books with educationally beneficial messages such as those expressed in "To Kill A Mockingbird" deserve as much attention as books considered to be appropriate.

First condemned for holding the words "damn," "whore," and "nigger," Lee's novel stirs controversy among school councils. Atticus Finch, a well-respected lawyer, is the father of the book's protagonist, Scout, and her brother, Jem. When Scout's "white" friends start to gossip and turn their backs on her, she learns that her father is the lawyer of a black man on trial for raping a white girl. The black people of the town take a liking to Atticus, but the white folk are disgusted by his social abnormality. Scout asks her father why he is defending the Negro and he replies, "because if I don't, I couldn't hold my head up."

Atticus' stance against racial discrimination is monumental for the time, as a challenge of the social norms. For students, the novel offers a valuable lesson in taking a stand for one's beliefs, even if those beliefs are not socially acceptable. Just because a novel offers situations not deemed "acceptable" in past times does not mean that students do not deserve to learn from them and gain a new perspective. The point of literature is just that: to share a viewpoint that can be accepted or rejected by the reader, or simply just respected.

To ban a novel such as "To Kill A Mockingbird" in a school system is to deprive students of reality. Lee's novel was banned from Lindale, Texas reading list of the Advanced Placement English class in 1996 because it conflicted with the values of the community. The situations that occur in the novel are a very real part of our world, and rather than being shaded from a students' eyes, they should be laid in front of students to teach tolerance and pride in one's beliefs. Even if a book contradicts the general values of a given community, the chance to see the other side of things should be valued just as highly.



In the 10th grade classrooms of Hopedale, not only is "To Kill A Mockingbird" assigned reading in English class, but also the court scene is acted out as a play, which is put on by the students so they can further grasp the concepts of racial injustice in the novel. This teaching strategy has proven extremely effective in teaching students the true meaning of what Harper Lee is trying to convey in her novel. School systems should not be allowed to violate the rights of students to access such an educational form of expression. The precious gift of gaining new perspectives through such novels far outweighs any vulgarity of explicitness that exists within its pages. To ban "To Kill Mockingbird" and other similar books is to take away from students a chance to gain a greater understanding of both the injustice and the humanity that dually exist in the world. The ugliness of the world exists, whether or not school systems want to acknowledge it, and it should be taught as an essential element in the educational institution.

Goodbye is not too hard to say

Ryan Aubert

Numerous major shows are coming to an end. That's right, the dreaded (or sometimes welcome) phrase: series finale. It can be a tough emotion to digest — how will you go on after your favorite show leaves forever? What will you do at 8 p.m. on Thursdays? Good question. But fret not, most shows live on into eternity through syndication.

Do I even need to say the name of the most popular show that is ending in less than two weeks? Are you going to miss your "Friends" on NBC? After 10 years, it will not be the same without Ross, Rachel, Chandler, Monica, Phoebe and Joey. Judging from the last episode, it seems every character is going off in their own way, with the writers tying up loose ends. It is truly an end of an era.

Matt LeBlanc, however, who plays Joey, has a spin-off planned but it probably won't end up being "Must-See TV." It is rumored that "Joey" will take the 8 p.m. time slot, as the Peacock Network scrambles to find new hits. "The Apprentice" scored, but really what else is there before 10 p.m. besides "Will & Grace"?

After his role on "Friends," Matt LeBlanc will star in the new "Joey."

Another NBC show that is going off the air is "Frasier." After 11 years on "Frasier" and 11 years on "Cheers" psychiatrist Dr. Frasier Crane (Kelsey Grammar) will not be seen on the tube anymore. After failing ratings for the show in the past few years, and imminent internal combustion, it was time to pull the plug. In its prime a few seasons back, the show garnered more Emmys than any other show in the history of television.

"Angel" is leaving in a sudden and unexpected way. Fans were riled up after the announcement a few months back, and fans even attempted a failed rescue. Apparently, the costs are too high and the show is not as good as it used to be. "Angel", now in its fifth season, is a spin-off of "Buffy the Vampire Slayer" and stars David Boreanaz as a vampire with a soul who is searching for redemption. After eight years of combined Buffy lore, it will be an apocalyptic moment for fans during the finale.

Some other shows on the magic picture box may be leaving as well, but official plans have not been announced yet as fans patiently wait. One of the shows in dire need of cancellation is "Star Trek: Enterprise." This prequel show, now in its third season has failed miserably on all levels. The story lines are recycled and the acting is bad. There has been a movement to save the show, but time will tell. An announcement should come in early May on the fate of this show.

The "Friends" two-hour series finale is May 6 on NBC at 8 p.m. The "Frasier" two-hour series finale is Thursday, May 13 on NBC. The "Angel" series finale airs May 19 on The WB. The "Star Trek: Enterprise" season and hopefully series finale airs May 26 on UPN. (Note: some air times were not available at press time, since finales are often longer or in a different time slot.)

Wishes do come true

Comedy for the kid in everyone

By Lauren Freeman
Collegian Staff

"Thirty, flirty and thriving."

These are the words that 13-year-old Jenna Rink whispers while being sprinkled with wishing dust and this is precisely what she becomes. She wakes up to find herself living in New York City as a well-paid editor at the number two magazine in the country "Poise" and above all things she is 30 years old. Confused, and immediately frightened, she has no recollection of the 17 some odd years that went by after making her wish.

'Thirteen Going on Thirty'
Directed by Gary Winick
Starring Jennifer Garner, Mark Ruffalo
Revolution
97 mins
Grade A

To her disgust, she finds out that she's become a greedy, dishonest, money-hungry businesswoman. The characterization of Jenna is fantastic because she has quite a bit of depth to her. She finds out that she harbors all of these negative characteristics — generally main characters only have a few flaws. The catch is that she can go back and attempt to undo some of the mistakes that she has apparently made. The sad reality sets in when, the audience realizes that they don't have magic wishing dust that can make us to come to these realizations and do something about it.

The funniest sequence of this movie takes place directly after she wakes up and realizes that her wish has been fulfilled. This is actress Jennifer Garner at her best. She is confused, quirky, loveable and childish in her naivete. She screams when she finds a naked man in her house, can't understand what is making that noise in her purse (cell phone) and is stunned by her fantastic female figure.

The film is certainly plot-driven, so the question becomes: would it be just as cute and fun if another actress, say Reese Witherspoon were to play the part? Garner has paid her dues as far as Hollywood is concerned. She has starred and co-starred in many television series including "Significant Others" and "Time of Your Life." More recently she has had a lead role in "Alias." She has played major and minor roles in all genres of film most significantly perhaps her roles in "Pearl Harbor" and "Daredevil." She was also in "Dude Where's My Car" and "Catch Me If You Can." This is an actress with flexibility in the types of roles she can handle. Her next endeavor is the title role in "Elektra." The sad truth, however, is nearly any 30-year-old actress could have successfully executed her part in this film with cute and classic feminine appeal (think Drew Barrymore.)

Herein lies a true challenge to Hollywood — why not cast a not so cute girly-girl for this type of role? What if Winona Ryder were to attempt this role? It would be an entirely different movie with new significance. While the movie is fun and perfect for a 13-year-old audience, it would be interesting to see what could happen if this same premise were allowed an R rating.

Rumor has it that this new film by not-so-well known director Gary Winick is a female remake of "Big." If this was what collaborating screenwriters Cathy Yuspa and Josh Goldsmith intended: who cares? The simple truth is all artists whether screenwriters or painters, sculptors or sandcastle-builders, derive inspiration from outside sources. It is very probable that Yuspa and Goldsmith have seen Tom Hanks in the 1980s film "Big." The question still remains what came first the chicken or the egg, the idea or the screenplay?

The idea of taking a child's mentality and somehow transporting it into an adult body is not a new one and it didn't begin with "Big" either. In fact "Freaky Friday" and "Like Father Like Son" were films that worked with a similar premise. When studying a film and its place in society it is definitely important to place it in a specific context and with art, this generally means re searching the canon of films that attempted similar things in the past. But this is not the be-all end-all of film criticism. It is, of course, important to attempt new and unique ideas but who's to say any idea is ever truly unique?

We simply cannot hold a film up to this unfair standard. Shakespeare stole from the Greek dramatists and they stole from their grandfather's bedtime stories, which were, if you go far enough back, derived from the study of cave drawings done at the beginning of mankind's ability to express creative ideas.

Jennifer Garner plays Jenna Rink, a 13-year-old girl who wishes herself 17 years older overnight.

Criticism of this kind does have impact if the film is phenomenally better or worse than films that attempted the same or similar ideas. This is not the case with "13 Going on 30" though. This film neither outdid nor failed in comparison with "Big" in its likeability.

The biggest difference between the two being that Tom Hanks' character became 30 years old while the world around him stayed the same age. Jenna goes from a girl in the '80s to a woman in 2004. This simple nostalgic device in and of itself is charming and dare I say, unique?

Ending with some Bump-ing music

Bobby Previte and Bump will perform tommorow at 8 p.m. in the Bezanson Recital Hall as the concluding act of the 15th Annual Magic Triangle Jazz Series.

Band fails to impress

Endochine's mixed sound lacking direction

By Cameron J. Woods
Collegian Staff

Imagine if you will: you are on a date with an individual you think has the most amazing backside in the universe. One thing leads to another and you find yourself in their bedroom, the next thing you know the buttocks that you so adored has been removed and set on the dresser top. That is essentially the affect that Edochine pulls with their new release, "Day Two." They get you all psyched up with the pretense of one sound and then totally abandon it.

Endochine 'Day Two' Attic

The album kicks off with a killer track, a la somewhat Jimmy's Chicken Shack, titled "Enough about you." The stinging whine of Nathan Harlan's vocals and the nu rock guitar wail, sound as if they could belong to the recently disbanded Queens of the Stoned Age. The track, heavy with sliding guitar holds and charged drums is catchy and a great opener; that is assuming that Edochine had more to give, which is debatable.

Both "Secret" and "Without Love" take that accent of whine and crank it all the way up. This album goes from an energetic pleasure to a weeping mess in a matter of seconds. Of these two tracks the one glimmering point lay in the intrepid guitar solos that broke through the gloom. These songs are meant to yoink on the heartstrings but at best it will prompt listeners to press the forward skip button.

Miraculously there is a pulse deeper inside this album, unfortunately it sounds like a Billy Idol song complete with the plastic sounding refrains and fills. Being a versatile band is a good thing for those who can pull it off, but when you range from a sappy emo song to an '80s rock tune and then into a new age electronic song, not too unlike the works of Moby what you get is an album that just feel disjointed.

"Ennui" is another song with a strength problem that tries to evoke emotion to little effect. Taking this song as a whole it is not too bad, but the grating dual vocals seems to be a bit much. Thankfully it is only an "excerpt," one can understand that some songs are so heavy that it could be hard to finish them but why would anyone put the half finished product onto disk?

More whining and half-hearted tracks that are as easily forgotten as they are skipped over round off this album. "Stalker" is as uninspired as their other works musically but lyrically it is a song worth paying attention to that is unless you easily get the creeps.

Though musically Endochine could use a bit of shaping and perhaps some defining of their sound, there is a sort of charm to the uninhibited energy that they put forth with their music. One problem that is clear to even the most inattentive of an ear is that this band is far too busy, with 11 listed musicians and who knows how many tag-along musicians, Edochine could serve to lose a few people. The disk comes with a secret Web site that contains some songs not included on the disk and other features including a thank you from the band which shows that Edochine is a band that has the one thing that the majority of bands lack today. That is an appreciation for their listeners.

The members of Endochine combine several contemporary styles of music, making for a unique sound.

LOS ANGELES (AP) - There's no aarrgg-uing: "Pirates of the Caribbean: The Curse of the Black Pearl" collected a leading six nominations for the MTV Movie Awards on Wednesday, including best movie and best on-screen team for co-stars Johnny Depp and Orlando Bloom.

Depp also was chosen for best male performance and comedic performance, while Geoffrey Rush's performance as a skeletal buccaneer earned him a mention for best villain. Keira Knightley, the seafaring movie's damsel in distress, was recognized among the breakthrough female nominees.

One surprise in the male performance category: Jim Caviezel collected a nomination for his role as Jesus in Mel Gibson's "The Passion of the Christ," the film's only MTV bid. Other nominees: Bill Murray for "Lost in Translation," Tom Cruise for "The Last Samurai" and Adam Sandler for "50 First Dates."

Johnny Depp received several nominations for the 2004 MTV Movie Awards for his role in "Pirates of the Caribbean."

Four nominations each went to the Sandler and Drew Barrymore comedy "50 First Dates" and the superhero sequel "X2: X-Men United." Along with "Pirates," both will compete with "Finding Nemo" and "The Lord of the Rings: The Return of the King" for best movie.

Although the third installment of the blockbuster "Rings" trilogy swept the Oscars this year with 11 awards, it had only two MTV nominations.

The show is known for its mockery and parody of the movie industry, featuring satiric clips of top movies edited with jokes and irreverent categories such as best kiss, best villain and best fight sequence.

The "best digital character" award, which Gollum from "The Lord of the Rings" collected last year, was dropped this year.

Producers added a new category, best dance sequence: Ben Stiller and Jennifer Aniston's hot salsa dance from "Along Came Polly" and Seann William Scott's disco dance-off from "American Wedding" will compete against Steve Martin's hip-hop moves from "Bringing Down the House," the sexy burlesque revue of Drew Barrymore, Cameron Diaz and Lucy Liu from "Charlie's Angels: Full Throttle" and the street dancing of Omarion, Marques Houston and the Lil' Saints Dance Crew from "You Got Served."

Oprah: Oject of envy

Oprah

ATLANTA (AP) – Talk-show host Oprah Winfrey realizes many women wish they could have her successful life.

"I know what that's like because I grew up wishing I could be Diana Ross," Winfrey said.

Winfrey spoke Saturday during her "Hi Gorgeous" tour, which promotes health, body acceptance and individuality. The sold-out event was geared toward subscribers of O, The Oprah Magazine, but also drew fans of her TV show.

Nearly 3,000 women paid $45 each to hear Winfrey speak and to learn lifestyle tips on healthy eating, matching wine with food and yoga.

"It's OK to be who you are," said Zannett Meeks, 39, who brought her 82-year-old grandmother to the event. "We all have the potential to reach high goals."

The tour stops in Kansas City and Jersey City, N.J., next month.

Playwright honored

Miller

TULSA, Okla. (AP) – Pulitzer Prize-winning playwright Arthur Miller has been named the winner of the 2004 Peggy V. Helmerich Distinguished Author Award.

The selection committee chose Miller on Friday, citing his body of work, which includes classics such as "The Crucible" and "Death of a Salesman," for which he won the Pulitzer Prize.

The award, which includes a $25,000 cash award, will be presented to Miller on Dec. 4.

Miller's work also includes "All My Sons," "A View From the Bridge" and "The Misfits," written in 1961 for then-wife Marilyn Monroe.

Although approaching 90, Miller continues to write and lecture. In 2001, he published a collection of essays titled "On Politics and the Art of Acting."

Polanski finds his 'Twist'

Polanski

PARIS (AP) – Roman Polanski has found the young lead for his next film, "Oliver Twist," based on Charles Dickens' classic novel.

Polanski launched a search of London's drama schools to find the right actor – one with a cockney accent typical of London's East End. The search resulted in 30 possible candidates.

After a screen test in Prague, where "Oliver Twist" will be shot, 10-year-old Barney Clarke won the role. Ben Kingsley will play Fagin. Shooting begins July 12.

Polanski, who lives in Paris with his wife, Emmanuelle Seigner, and their two children, told a press conference Monday that it was time for "Oliver Twist" to make a comeback.

"It is destined for children, particularly my own children," said Polanski, who saw and loved David Lean's 1948 version as a child. "It has been two generations since anyone touched it."

Polanski won a best-director Oscar last year for "The Pianist," which starred Adrien Brody as Wladyslaw Szpilman, a Polish-Jewish pianist who hid from the Nazis inside a Warsaw ghetto.

The director, who didn't attend the ceremony in Los Angeles, said Harrison Ford has been keeping the Oscar for him. Polanski faces arrest if he returns to the United States, resulting from 1977 charges of allegedly having unlawful sex with a minor.

The sleeping star

Beckham

LONDON (AP) – Fans used to seeing soccer star David Beckham in motion on the field can now study him at rest in bed.

An hour-long "video portrait" of Beckham asleep after training in Madrid, where he plays for Real Madrid, was to go on display Tuesday at the National Portrait Gallery.

The gallery, which houses portraits of famous Britons in every field, said Monday that the Beckham piece, titled "David," was "intriguing and intimate." It was shot in a single, long take and runs in a continuous loop on a plasma screen.

"It is very immediate and I think rather powerful," gallery director Sandy Nairne told Channel 4 TV.

Still playing doctor

'ER' keeping staff in midst of lineup shifts

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK (AP) – "ER" star Noah Wyle has watched every other member of the original cast make an exit from the 10-year-old medical drama.

But for Wyle, there's nothing wrong with steady work on a hit series, even as you say goodbye to old friends.

Saying goodbye to "Friends" felt odder.

"That left me not just the last man standing on the set, but the last man standing on the lot," he explains, speaking of Warner Bros. studios in Burbank, Calif., where both series were filmed.

"Those two shows came on the air at the same time [fall 1994]," says Wyle. "We sold them together. We promoted them together." He even guest-starred on a "Friends" episode.

"The day the cast filmed their last episode, I saw them in the commissary. It was heavy. Here they were, closing a defining chapter in each of their lives, and all I could do was think: 'The end of that chapter's coming, for me.'"

Don't quake, NBC! Sure, you'll be losing your biggest comedy in just a week. But your biggest drama, "ER," another staple of your "must-see" Thursday lineup, will close out its season with new episodes the next three weeks, then stay put in its 10 p.m. EDT berth for its return next fall.

And Dr. John Carter – Wyle's character – will remain as attending physician at Chicago's County General Hospital.

Why is simple. Unlike George Clooney, Anthony Edwards, Eriq La Salle, Julianna Margulies or Sherry Stringfield (who left "ER" in 1996 then returned to the fold in 2001), Wyle hasn't found a compelling reason to make the break from a series he still loves.

"I find the job extremely gratifying," he says during a recent visit to Manhattan, "and the story lines are still exciting and in keeping with the character's continuity, which I've worked so hard to maintain all these years."

Carter in recent seasons has suffered a near-fatal knife wound from a deranged patient and battled substance abuse, and now he's about to face a crisis endangering the child he is expecting with his girlfriend, whom he met on a medical-relief trip to Africa.

The current "ER" troupe includes Laura Innes, Mekhi Phifer, Alex Kingston, Goran Visnjic, Maura Tierney, Ming-Na, Sharif Atkins, Parminder Nagra and Linda Cardellini, along with Wyle, who steadily rose to his leadership position – not unlike Carter.

Noah Wyle will return for his 11th "ER" season.

Certainly Carter has come a long way since "ER" began. He was a third-year medical student, wide-eyed at the turmoil around him and often overwhelmed by it.

And from week one, Carter proved to be a juicy role for Wyle, then a 22-year-old Hollywood native (and son of an orthopedic nurse), who, after studying drama at Northwestern University, had scored only one prior success: a small part in the film "A Few Good Men."

"As Carter was getting comfortable in the environment of a hospital, I was getting comfortable on a film set," Wyle recalls. "To a certain degree, we had the same fear of failure, the same driving motivations." He chuckles. "Carter's craving for the approbation and approval of his co-workers was equal to mine. You know?"

These days, Wyle echoes the hard-won maturity of the character he plays. He is happily married to Tracy, a former makeup artist; as the father of 18-month-old Owen, he embraces parenthood: "I've never smiled wider, felt happier, and – when I imagine what could take those feelings away – never felt so vulnerable."

Of course, even at 32, Wyle retains the boyish air that first earned him heartthrob status. For his interview, he is casually clad in jeans, yellow oxford shirt and brown sweater, and tennis shoes. He displays a couple days' stubble on his baby face, along with those arched, guileless eyebrows, which seem to certify everything he says.

He has a serious manner, but when his interrogator momentarily lags in asking the next question, Wyle jumps in with a string of waggish answers: "Six-foot-2. Brown and brown. Gemini," he recites. "Somewhere between 32- and 34-inch waist."

His extra-"ER" credits include the thriller "Enough" (2002), co-starring with Jennifer Lopez as a bad-guy cop, and as Steve Jobs in the cable movie "The Pirates of Silicon Valley" (1999). He was in the all-star ensemble for the 2000 live-television production of "Fail Safe."

He's also busy off-camera. Among his activities: serving as spokesman for Cover the Uninsured Week 2004, an initiative co-chaired by former Presidents Ford and Carter to draw attention to the issue of Americans who lack health coverage. This media blitz will take place May 10-16, Wyle says.

"The nightly news terrifies America about the theoretical – things that probably will not come to pass," he says. "But the things that come to pass every single day for 44 million Americans should be newsworthy. For a week, it will be."

Sox recall Daubach as Burks has knee surgery

BOSTON — The Boston Red Sox called up Brian Daubach from Triple-A Pawtucket on Tuesday to replace Ellis Burks, who is expected to miss six weeks after knee surgery.

Daubach was designated for assignment by the Sox on April 10 and then reported to Pawtucket.

Daubach was a member of Boston's opening day roster and played in two games, including one pinch-hit appearance, before being designated for assignment on April 10 and outrighted to Pawtucket April 14. With the PawSox, Daubach hit .350 (14-for-40) with 13 runs scored, 5 homers and 11 RBI in 10 games. He hit safely in eight of his 10 games, including multi-hit efforts in six games.

Daubach, who has often served as a designated hitter and can also play the outfield, averaged 21 homers and 75 RBIs for Boston from 1999-02.

With the addition of Daubach, the Red Sox 40-man roster now stands at 40 players.

The Red Sox will be without the services of designated hitter Ellis Burks for the foreseeable future, as the 39-year-old veteran will undergo arthroscopic surgery on his left knee on Tuesday. Burks was placed on the 15-day disabled list during Monday's off day.

He suffered the injury — a medial meniscus tear — during Spring Training, but tried to fight through it.

The injury might serve as a reason for the slow start Burks has had at the plate, as he's hitting .133 with one homer and one RBI.
